LETTERS HOME FROM

SCENES OF FIGHTING

Interesting Word From W. Brindle and Pte. Herman Thomas

Another interesting letter has been received from W. Brindle, a member of the Railway Construction Corps at the front. He writes graphically of the second wave of destruction that has passed over that war-devastated section of France and Belgium. Following the effects of the fighting of 1915, 16 and 17, nature, he said, was beginning to heal her battle scars of those years when they were opened afresh by the new forward movement of the Allies. He describes the scene wonderfully and tells of the tearing up of the ground that was just beginning to bloom once again. His letter follows:

France, Sept. 17, 1918. Dear Brother Leiford—I am sending on the flowers you asked for in your last letter and which I promised in mine. We have been on the move since I last wrote you, and we are now in advance of the place we were located when Fritz had his big push in March. I believe he has a better idea of what a push really is now than he had then. There was the push of the French at Rheims, then ours at Amiens, again at Albert, Bapaume, Peronne, and up north, then the Americans at St. Mihiel, and last but not least the splendid victory over the Bulgarians.

All that is some push, believe me, but even as I write I think you will find we are on the eve of another push which will take us up to and even through the Hindenburg line at one of its most important points. During the last two weeks my duties have taken me over a circle on the battle ground covering about sixty miles, and I have had an opportunity of seeing with my own eyes the awful effects of this second wave of destruction which has passed over this part of the country. I don't know who coined the phrase "War is hell," but after seeing what I have seen I think it would very much increase my fear of the lower regions if someone told me that Hell was war. Nature had made a huge effort to heal her battle scars of 1915, 16, 17, for when I was over this ground in the early months of the year, spring was bringing to life the wild flowers of the old battlefield. The wild violets peeped shyly from the surrounding green, the yellow buttercups turned their shining faces to the morning sun, and the early daisies filled their pink petals with the morning dew. The huge craters, the smaller shell holes, and the disfiguring trenches were largely grown over. Scores of horse and tractor ploughs had been at work, and many of the peasants had returned to their holdings and temporarily patched up their ruined houses. Now, the face of nature has been furrowed by new trenches, her green mantle has been scratched and torn by miles upon miles of cruel barbed wire, and her gentle bosom scarred and slashed anew by bursting bomb and rending shell. It is such sights as these which rob us of the full fruits of our late victories, for one cannot feel joy and sorrow at the same time and the man who can gaze on this awful scene of outraged nature and not feel sad is hard indeed. And now to revert to the flowers. I don't know in what condition they will reach you, but they left here quite fresh, and I packed them on several layers of soft tissue paper in the hope that the moisture would help keep them some. They are poor little things anyway, but I thought I would send you a few for only a fortnight previous to my plucking them, the iron-headed minions of the Kaiser had tramped over the breast of their mother.

The dog daisies, the poppies and the convolvulus are right from the battlefield, and will doubtless speak to you (the white flowers) of the purity of our cause, and the red of the blood of our boys which has been so freely shed in its defence. The red berries are from a solitary tree which had bravely weathered the storms of battle. The bunch of grapes was one of hundreds, plucked it from the front wall of a house I had known under better conditions; the people feel from it under the rain of shells and bomb which broke its windows and crashed through its roof in March, and all untended the vine had brought forth her fruit in great abundance.

The boys from home have been used in many places of late, and have done full justice in all cases to the great name they long ago made for themselves, and the various troops with which from time to time I come in touch are never tired of telling the wonderful things our boys have accomplished.

I suppose you have already heard that my eldest boy is again in an English hospital suffering from further wounds. Well, Brother Leiford, the war still goes on, but I have every hope that spring will about see the end of it. I would very much like to have been home on a leave this Christmas, but it is absolutely impossible, and I am informed that it is useless to put in an application. I guess I shall have to be satisfied with the usual two weeks in England. I hope everything is going on all right with the lodge. Remember me very kindly to all its members and any inquiring friends, and for yourself and

Pte. Herman Thomas Writes Home. Charles H. Thomas, 89 Carleton street, this city has received two long letters from his son, Private Herman J. T. Thomas who went overseas with the 26th Kiltie battalion and is now a member of the 42nd Canadian. Extracts from his letter follow:

"You must excuse me for not writing you before, but it was impossible as I have been practically in the front line since August 8 until now and this is the only chance I have had to drop you a letter. You spoke of Steve Fry being wounded. I was only a short distance from him when he got hit. But you know there is no stopping to see who is it. I have been in a lot of hard fights since Steve was hit and have been lucky. Thank God."

"We made a big push and drove Mr. Fritz back so far from many fronts that it is hard to find him. He is certainly getting an awful licking now and there is worse coming to him. Jack has been in all scraps also and sends his love to you. I am going to send you a five mark note, German money. I took from a Heine. I will mail it to you in my next letter soon."

"We are giving them square heads or 'Heines' an awful licking. We certainly gave him an awful drive for over a month steadily. Steve Fry was wounded one afternoon about 4 o'clock. His company was on the left of us, so I had no chance to see him, but fellows along side of him told me he was not hit badly."
