The chief superintendent of education leaves early next week for Kings county. He will first go to Kingston, the seat of the Consolidated school, to find, if possible, some way of cutting down the expenses of the institution. Last year it cost between $6,500 and $7,000 to conduct the school. The McDonald Fund will be obtainable for only one more year, and after that time the school cannot be run at its present excessive cost. The assessment for the seven school districts included in the consolidated is less than $800. The arrangement now is that the government pays half of the cost of conveying the children and the ordinary provincial teachers' grants, and the McDonald fund pays the balance. Last year $2,037.08 was paid out by the province and almost $4,000 by the McDonald Rural School fund. Dr. Inch says that he thinks the conveying cost is excessive, and proposes having the children living on branch roads walk to the junction with the main road and take the vans there, to charge a small fee to non-resident pupils, and the staff of teachers may be cut down, and the one or two of the outside districts cut off. Dr. Inch will also visit Hampton, where the two Hampton schools and the Hendricks schools are to be consolidated. The school building to be erected with the equipment for Hampton will probably cost close to $20,000.
