

"And is that all?" mamma wanted to know.
 "Why, yes," said Johnny. "She's dirty and black and horrid! We don't want her 'round."
 Mamma was about to speak, then checked herself and went back into the house. Presently Johnny came in, crying, and ran for help. He had fallen into a puddle and was dripping with mud.
 "Oh, mamma! mamma!" he cried, sure of help from her.
 She rose and started toward him, then turned and sat down again.
 "Jane," she said, quietly, to the nurse, who was sewing near by, "do you know where there are any good-sized gravel stones?"
 Nurse looked up, astonished, and Johnny stopped his loud noise to stare.
 "Stones, ma'am?" asked Jane.
 "Yes," said mamma, "to throw at Johnny. He's been in a puddle and is dirty and black and horrid! We don't want such things around."
 Johnny felt as if this was more than he could bear, but a funny gleam in his mother's eye kept his heart from being quite broken.
 "Please, mamma, I'll never do it again!" he cried, in humble tones.
 "Poor kitty! I see now just how bad I made her feel."
 Johnny was then washed and comforted, but he did not soon forget the little lesson of kindness to those in misfortune.—Sunbeam.

Sometimes we see a little child trying to lift something too heavy for his strength. He works away, his face growing hot and flushed, now moving the unwieldy thing to this side or that, but never raising it. Before he can succeed in this he will have to grow larger and stronger.
