The first German attack was launched just as night was faling, after a day of wind and rain. The thick weather had inerfered seriously with the British artillery and had cloaked the German preparations.

Late in the afternoon the heavy guns posted on the German third line, east of Longueval, opened fire on the British lines. High explosive shells rained down on the trenches, while tear- improved today. producing shells were hurled at the men who held them. In addition, the wind carrying toward the British trenches, the Germans loosed great clouds of noxious gas, and then under cover of veloped early all along the front of the attack and is still being waged with great fury, according to a report sent to the War Office at a late hour by General Sir Douglas Haig.
