FIGHTING FOR A NAME.

"Why, Marmie, I really believe you are getting jolly and happy as well as pretty and strong," he cried, regarding her affectionately.

She laughed again, then told him he must run away to the office, while she put away her things before supper, after which they would go for a walk on the beach.

The next morning Gertrude brought her mother to Mrs. Heatherton's room, and Mrs. Langmaid, having learned something of the unfortunate history from her husband, was prepared to take her right into her kind heart.

She found that she was, as Mr. Langmaid had told her, a lady every sense of the word; she could not acknowledge to herself, there were few in the world more beautiful and attractive.

They had a pleasant interview, for Mrs. Langmaid was very unassuming and friendly, and Miriam, who had shunned all society for so long, began to feel that it would be exceedingly delightful to have the acquaintance of a refined and cultivated woman once more.

Late on Saturday afternoon, four days after her interview with Mr. Langmaid, that gentleman tapped upon the door of the linen room, and when Miriam opened it he handed her an official-looking envelope, simply remarking, with a smile:

"I trust you will find in this something to cheer you."

Then he went away, leaving her to open the envelope by herself.

The woman's delicate fingers trembled as she broke the seal and drew forth the contents, and a low exclamation of joy escaped her as she unfolded it and found it to be the original certificate of her marriage, signed by Dr. Harris, the clergyman who had performed the ceremony, and "William K. Mathews" as witness.

There was also written explaining how the gentleman happened to have the document in his possession at this late date.

Knowing the circumstances regarding the so-called "mock-marriage" (he wrote) he had thought it best to give the certificate to either Mr. Heatherton or his bride at that time, but had intended to send it to them later, to avoid the scene which he felt sure must ensue when Mr. Heatherton should discover that he had been legally married by a clergyman.

Unfortunately, however, he had mislaid the document upon his return home that evening, and it did not come to light again for several days.

Mr. Heatherton had left college and gone abroad, and he was unable to obtain his address for a long time afterwards he learned from Mr. Mathews the sad results of that night's work, and he had bitterly reproached himself for having allowed himself to have anything to do with the affair. He requested Mr. Mathews to sign the document, to show that he had been a witness, and thus make the proof doubly sure, if Mrs. Heatherton could ever be found and should need it. He was very glad to be able to do her justice, even at this late date, and regretted, more than he could express, the sorrow and suffering she had endured during the last thirteen years. He requested that Mr. Langmaid would also sign the certificate as another witness, before giving it to Mrs. Heatherton.

This he had done, and now no one could ever question the legality of the ceremony which had made her Richard Heatherton's wife.

The letter was most kind and sympathetic, and there were tears of gratitude in Miriam Heatherton's eyes as she read it, and a song of praise in her heart for this justification, even though it had come to her so late.

That night she told Ned the sad story of her life—of her wrongs, her sufferings, and why she had always called him by her maiden name, instead of giving him his father's.

Ned listened to the pathetic recital, with a flushed and downcast face, but when his mother concluded he looked up into her eyes and fiercely exclaimed:

"I hate him—that man! I am glad I have never known him! I am glad that he is dead!"

His mother was startled by the passionate ring in his tone.

"I do not wish you to cherish hate in your heart against any one, Ned," she said in a tone of gentle reproach.

"I cannot ask you to respect your father's memory, for I have no respect for him myself, but since he is gone, we will not hate, but simply ignore him altogether, and try to be as happy as we can in each other, for the future."

"This is why you have always been so unhappy, dear mother?" Ned asked, his face softening to an expression of wistful regret.

"Yes, dear; the past has been full of wretchedness for me, because of my supposed questionable position, and because of the stigma which I believed must always rest upon you."

"It was too bad—a shame, but—but will you try to be happy now?" Ned asked, with tears in his eyes.

"I am very happy now, dear," she answered tenderly.

"And I will make you more so," he said eagerly. "You shall never be unhappy about me. I promise that I will never do anything to make you ashamed of me, and I mean, some time, that you shall be very proud of me."

"You have always been a great comfort to me, Ned, and you grow more and more so," she answered, kissing him; then she added, flushing slightly: "But I want to talk with you, and tie about our name. I think it will be best for us to take the name of Heatherton."

"I hate the name!" Ned broke forth, impetuously.

"It is a very good name—one that has been highly respected, and you must not condemn it simply because one person has dishonored it," said his mother gravely. "I think there are several reasons why it will be better for us to be known by the name that rightly belongs to us."

Well, I suppose you are right—you always are," Ned thoughtfully remarked, "but, please, mother, do not make any change while we are here this summer—it would cause so much talk. Let us wait until we go back to Boston, in the fall, then, if you think best, we will take the name of Heatherton."

Mrs. Heatherton agreed with him, that it would be well to wait, and thus the matter was left for the present.

CHAPTER XL

One morning about a week after the birthday party, Ned was sent down to the boat, landing upon an errand of some kind.

Having waited until the boat had disengaged her passengers and cargo, he transposed his business and then started back toward the hotel.

As he approached the house he noticed a strange dog running along ahead of him with his nose to the ground, and behaving rather queerly.

But, unobtrusively, he did not pay much attention to him, and just as he was about to cross the croquet ground, which lay between him and the veranda, he heard a wild shriek, and looking up, he saw one of the little girls who boarded at the hotel, following towards the piazza, the dog barking close upon her heels, frothing at the mouth, his tongue protruding, his eyes glowing like coals of fire.

"He is mad!" cried Ned, growing as white as his collar, while his heart leaped into his throat with terror as he realized the child's danger.

"That is little Nellie Truett!" he panted. "Oh, she must not be bitten! What shall I do?"

He had not had a thought regarding his own safety, he was only intent upon devising deliverance for the sweet little girl, whom everyone loved, as he hurried onward.

But Ned was scarcely less distressed now on account of the danger of his kind friend, who was still approaching the dog, his cane extended directly before him.

THOUSANDS TELL THE SAME STORY

NOVA SCOTIA LADY FOUND SPLENDID HEALTH IN A COMBINED TREATMENT OF DODD'S DYSPEPSIA TABLETS AND DODD'S KIDNEY PILLS.

There is nothing in the world that so quickly and surely brightens up a right-down woman as a combined treatment of Dodd's Dyspepsia Tablets and Dodd's Kidney Pills.

Dodd's Dyspepsia Tablets insure the proper digestion of the food—make sure that every part of the body gets the food that it needs.

Dodd's Kidney Pills insure healthy kidneys—make sure that the kidneys strain all the impurities out of the blood, and send the pure blood coursing through the body.

That these are the essentials of health and vigor is proven by thousands of statements like that of Mrs. John A. Lawrence, of Maitland, N. S.: "I have used six boxes of Dodd's Kidney Pills, and have not enjoyed as good health in years. I cannot praise them too highly."

Women who are suffering in secret—and there are thousands of them in Canada—should take their sister's advice, and take Dodd's Dyspepsia Tablets and Dodd's Kidney Pills.

THE RIGHT BRAND OF BALL TO PLAY

Cleveland and Detroit in an Errorless Game—Toronto and Montreal Lose.

The star game of yesterday in the big leagues was played between Detroit and Cleveland. Neither team made an error. Cleveland made eight hits and Detroit six, and the score was 3 to 2 in the former's favor. Each team did its scoring in one inning. Washington added another defeat to its credit—or discredit. Both of the Canadian teams lost their games. The results:

CANADIANS WILL MEET BETTER CLASS OF JUMPERS

Reports from an occasional correspondent around New York say that the Canadians will meet a better class of jumpers on the Metropolitan circuit this year than for many seasons past. He says there are nearly two hundred best cross-country performers now taking their daily work at Morris Park and among them are, according to his opinion, really high class timber-toppers. There are, moreover, owners at the present time of steeplechase riders than ever before in the history of racing in the United States and the result of the rivalry has been an increase in the quality of the horses performing at the Metropolitan.

The Canadian contingent will be fairly bunched at the Ontario Jockey Club meeting this month. That meeting will, in all probability, define the class of most of them. It is scarcely necessary to add that any horse able to negotiate the course and out of the gate, and to beat the score of 23 to 13 in any one year.

FULL OF NOTIONS AND AILMENTS

Maud S. a Strange Horse—The Mile That Gave Her the World's Record.

It is not much of a stopwatch, as stopwatches are reckoned nowadays, but it has been honored as are but few watches of modern make. Its owner, Dr. Frank W. Slosson, veterinary druggist, is very proud of it. And for good reason, says the Detroit Tribune.

On a certain bright afternoon in 1884, at the Glenville track, that watch ticked off 2 minutes and 88 seconds, then, in response to a pressure of Slosson's thumb, stopped.

At that very instant Maud S. flashed under the wire a world-beater, and to his friends, he first takes out his handkerchief and wipes off imaginary spots from its dulled silver case.

Slosson is one of the few remaining horsemen of the old type. Knowing a thing or two of equine anatomy, he was in great demand at the Glenville track, and it was in his professional capacity that he first made the acquaintance of Maud S. Baer, who drove the mare, often called Slosson, into consultation regarding her ailments, which were many.

So Slosson puts it, "She was fuller of notions and ailments than any four-legged animal I ever met."

You see," says Slosson, describing Maud S.'s record, "she had been getting her into shape to after the record for a long time. Naturally, having had a good deal to do with her condition, I was interested."

Peter Johnson, an old trainer; Woodmansey, manager of General Kitchin's stable at St. Paul, and I were on the grandstand near the wire, and we all held our watches on Maud S."

"We had it 2:08 1/2. So did two of the three watches in the judges' stand. A messenger was sent over to us to ask us what time we had caught."

With three such reliable timekeepers, you must remember that Maud S. had beaten the world's trotting record, and we all began to feel that we were in luck."

"Now that horses are trotting on both sides of two minutes," continued Slosson, "Maud S.'s time looks poor. With three such reliable timekeepers, you must remember that Maud S. had beaten the world's trotting record, and we all began to feel that we were in luck."
