will begin the publication of a new story, story, "THE JUST AND THE UNJUST," By Vaughan Kester, author of "The Prodigal Judge." In time, place and theme, "The Just and the Unjust" is strikingly different from "The Prodigal Judge," but it has an equal charm of style, vigor of characterization, and play of robust and human humor.

And now the dreams were gone. He had lost. He had lost forever. He knew it. Never again would he be so strong it. Never again would he be so strong as he was on the morning he had faced his brother. If wasn't possible for him the ever again to feel so strong physically or so confident. When he had begun to fight and up to the moment his legs had crumbled beneath him he had been as sure of accomplishing his purpose as it is possible for a man to be. And he had lost. Even after that he had lost. With the blue eyes of his own son, flesh of his flesh, blood of his blood, he had lost. He felt like shricking this to God himself in a defiant challenge for an explanation. But, after all, what did it matter now? For the first few days he meaned this fact to himself. Now he didn't even do that. With head bowed he listened while the words were toiled into his doll brain, him twice and had followed him for a limit where he found him. He would take the child. He had a right to his own. He would take the thid and seize the child. It was his child. He had a right to his own. He would take the kid off to Boston. He wash is child. "'Gene, I'm going back home now."

He did not answer.

"I'm going back home," repeated Nat.
"Why, don't ye come along with me?"
This was not a command; it was merely a suggestion.

"What for." asked 'Gene.
"I expect they'll be missin' ye by now.' 'Who?'' asked 'Gene.

"Who," asked 'Gene.
"Why, all your folks. It's three weeks since ye left."
'Gene looked up at his brother, then out the window, then back at the floor.
"We'll catch the first train, and that'll get ye to St. Croix this afternoon. What e say?"
'All right," answered 'Gene indifferently.

As the man rose to his feet Nat stepped forward with his hand outstretched.

"It's quits with us, 'Gene," he said. "I want to tell ye straight that I haven't given ye credit for what there is in ye. I guess no man has a right to judge another, nohow. After this we go our two ways. And it i'll help ye any, I'll tell ye I'm going to clear out."

"I want to get something to take home to the kid."

With the blood in his face, his eyes burning as though with fever, 'Gene followed. They went into a toy store, and there Nat bought an armful of dolls and tiny carts and gayly colored balls. 'Gene watched him in a daze. It was he who by rights should have been buying those things. He saw as in a vision those chubby hands reaching out to grasp the toys, and his throat grew tight and hot. From there they went into a clothing store, and here Nat bought recklessly. The salesman had only to show him a cap or store, and here Nat bought recklessly. The salesman had only to show him a cap or a pair of tiny shoes or a dress in order to make a sale. Nat laughed as he bought, and without asking the price reached down into his pocket and brought out bills by the handful.

'Gene fumbled at the bills in his own pocket. They burned his fingers. He sought the door for air. Then he stepped out upon the sidewalk, and before he knew it found himself carried on by the crowd. He quickened his pace. Once beyond the direct influence of his brother. 'Gene felt as in a panic. He didn't know Gene felt as in a panic. He didn't know where he was going; he didn't care. as he did so he saw a man bolt through a pair of swinging green doors. He found himself before a bar.

"Whisky," he ordered.
The hot liquid burned his throat as he poured it down, but he liked it. He drank another glass and then another. It sent the blood to his brain and quickened his thoughts. In another five minutes it had made a man of him again. Once again he feit the old power in his arms; once again he dreamed his old dreams. He had thought that never could he face Nat again, and now—why he could batter down a dozen men his size. An inspiration seized him; he would find Nat and beat him where he found him. Mr. Tyrell went on to say that the limate, so far as they could ascertain, vould in no way be a drawback to the district as an agricultural country. Cobalt, Feb. 23.—Numerous and peculiarly ingenious have been the methods of secretly getting liquor to mining camps of Northern Ontario, but the most recent, just discovered at South Porcupine, takes the palm for novelty and at the same time reflects credit on astuteness of the provincial police. By some means or other the authorities had received information, and the result was that a woman, on being searched after alighting from the train, was found to be wearing an artificial bust manufactured out of tin or galvanized iron, which contained no less than two gallons of the raw spirit. She also wore a kind of life-belt containing a further two gallons. The police on confiscating the liquor allowed her to go.
