If the many demands on his time and attention preclude the indulgence of the mechanical bent which was so manifest in childhood Prince Edward has developed a great interest in the nation's workday activities, and in his visits to industrial centres he has shown kees and appreciative interest in technical operations.

Not only does he show a discerning and approving interest in the industrial developments on which, more than ever, the prosperity of the country depends, but, like his parents, he is intensely concerned for the welfare of the workers—solicitous to learn how their living conditions may be improved and their social status bettered. He has endeavored by personal visits to crowded areas to gain first-hand an intimate acquaintance with the lives of the masses, and wherever he has gone he has left indeliblememories of unaffected goodwill and sympathy. Tributes to his worth and kindness are plentiful in districts where the very poorest live, for, if reticent himself, the objects of his regard are not to be silenced.

It was recently reported that through a motor accident a youth was knocked down, but, fortunately, not seriously injured, by the car in which the prince was seated, and that his Royal Highness was greatly moved by the regretable mishap. He removed the injured lad to a hospital and remained there anxiously till assured that the sufferer was in no danger and would very soon be well. Later, when the youth was able to go out, the prince invited him to Buckingham Palace, and treated him like a dear friend and asked him what particular present he would prefer as a sourceir. The lad replied that he would most appreciate a wrist-watch, and the prince assured him that his wish would be promptly gratified.

That reported incident is but one of the many that have never found publicity, proving beyond question that the prince is distinguished by very fine qualities and a noble character. A true gentleman himself, he is extraordinarily susceptible to the courtesy and consideration of others—all the more if these be displayed by humble folk as many soldiers and civilians can vouch. In these cases he is genuinely touched and his eager responsiveness leaves no doubt as to his gratification.
