

"It has been determined to abandon Eupatoria, and orders have been sent there to carry the town. There is a rumor that the latter inhabitants who have fled to the hills are to be removed to Bosphorus. The gale appears to have injured the Russian troops at the entrance of Sevastopol, as they lost another two decks yesterday (17th) in the same position as the others."

"Troy had been much fighting since the battle of Inkermann, with no very important result. In repelling an attack, the English stormed and took one of the advanced batteries of the Russians, and have since employed their conquest against the enemy."

The London Guardian, from which we have made our selections, makes the following remarks with reference to the campaign, and to the conduct and health of the Duke of Cambridge, which latter we regret to perceive, has been sadly affected by the trying scenes through which, with all the heroism of his ancient race, he has so creditably passed:—

"No offensive movement had, since the 5th, been attempted on either side; and Liprandi's retreat on the Balak field shows that the Russians had begun to find some difficulty in providing for their collected army."

"There is nothing worth notice in the Russian bulletins of the battle of Inkermann, except the happy audacity of General Dannenbergs assertion that he was beaten by a superior force, and Prince Menschikoff's dubious position, in the name of the army, for decorations for the two Grand Dukes, who were never visible in the field until they were seen dashing across the river in the retreat. How it contrasts with the occasional mention—dry, uncourtly-like, and nicely just—which Lord Raglan's despatches have bestowed on our own Prince of the Blood! The Duke of Cambridge has worked as hard, lived as nobly, and perilled his life as freely as any soldier in the army; his division has been sent into the hottest fire, and he was always at the head of it: and he comes in among the other officers of his rank for his exact quantum of precious, because scanty and discriminating praise. And there is not a soldier in the army who does not heartily lament the cause which has lately removed him from the camp, and sent him invalided on ship board. The accretion perpetrated in his sight upon his wounded comrades, joined probably to the fiery excitement of that desperate struggle, have it is said—and it has ceased to be mere rumour—unshaken his mind; but we hope and believe that the disorder will not be of long duration."

A treaty has been concluded with Austria, by which it is said that Power binds herself to join the Allies, if Russia does not within three months consent to the terms upon which they propose to secure a present and lasting peace.

"It has been determined to abandon Eupatoria, and orders have been sent there to carry the town. There is a rumor that the latter inhabitants who have fled to the hills are to be removed to Bosphorus. The gale appears to have injured the Russian troops at the entrance of Sevastopol, as they lost another two decks yesterday (17th) in the same position as the others."
