since we have the 100-mile limit. I don't know, frankly, how they would manage! They are very concerned that it would be-not like Alaska-but like Bangladesh! So they are very opposed to any such development.

But, again, I think we are looking at very dark scenarios; and we seem to be painting the worst possible picture. I don't see it.

MEMBER OF THE PRESS: If we keep that picture, could they, possibly, go with Quebec?

MINISTER LALONDE: No! At best, a small part of New Brunswick could go with Quebec, which is about half of it, which is Acadia--where the Acadians are--which is a French speaking population. But all of the rest is English speaking. They would not go with Quebec. Definitely not!

I think they would go with Maine before going with Quebec.

MEMBER OF THE PRESS: Is that a possibility?

MINISTER LALONDE: Not a serious one. I don't think so. Again, unless Maine were to strike oil and agree to share it with the Maritimes. I don't see this as any great likelihood. I think they have a long tradition of being Canadians. I don't think they would receive very substantial economic advantages in doing this.

MEMBER OF THE PRESS: In the case of Separatism, what would the French community do inside of the English
