This means an election, and Laurier's speech sounds like the opening of the campaign.

Sir Wilfrid alleged he stood upon the constitution, but he drew his constitution from Britain, which had extended the term of Parliament more than once. The issue before the Canadian people should be, "Win the war," but Sir Wilfrid desired to make it, "Win the elections." Those who were doing their best office to win the war were to be forced into the turmoil of election that certain selfish ambitions might be satisfied. In an election it was impossible to say what proportions of the 300,000 Canadians overseas would be able to have the opportunity of casting their votes. Sir Wilfrid Laurier declared against the extension resolution. Only 6 of the 26 conscription Liberals voted for extension. The Government carried the resolution by the majority of 20. The vote, combined with the declaration of the prime minister, makes election certain.
