M. BROWNE,
Professor of the New Medical System, founded by Luigi Galvani, for which he has obtained His Majesty's Most Excellent Will or Writ of Letters Patent under the Great Seal, in relation to the following:—
HAVING ascertained that immemorially the new Medical System of Galvani, combined with the Chiroplast, has fallen in the ground in Europe, and that the medical profession, and the public, have been misled by the ignorant and unscrupulous imitators of the Galvani system, which is now being taught in the (so-called) Academies of the Faculty of Medicine, Paris, and in the University of London, and in several places in the East and West Indies. In June, 1810, there were not fewer than one hundred and ten Professors of this system, and two months ago there were one hundred and eighty of the most celebrated Medical characters, and each of whom was required to pay the amount of their diploma, together with several other charges, and to issue themselves, relative to their characters as Professors of the same, individually and respectively in the sum of Five Hundred Pounds sterling.

The following letters of the most eminent Professors will, it is presumed, warrant the offering of the Chiroplast to the public, with the fullest confidence and respect, and a patronage proportioned to its manifest advantages.
From Sir John A. Stevenson, M.D., Doctor of Law, to Mr. J. B. Logier.
My Dear Sir,
With the greatest gratification I have examined your very ingenious Chiroplast, and think that it will forward the progress of the Chiroplast, without difficulty to the scholar, and from its simplicity, must have great currency in the medical world. I shall be happy to recommend it, and remain with every wish for the success of your invention.
Yours, most truly, &c.
To Mr. J. B. Logier.
London, August 19, 1814.

To Mr. J. B. Logier.
I have examined your new Invention called the Patent Chiroplast, for facilitating the improvement of a proper accretion on the Pieno Forte, and I am so well persuaded of its great utility, that I cannot but give it the warmest approbation and recommendation.
I am, dear Sir,
Your most faithful friend, and obedient servant,
MUZIO CLEMENTI.

To Mr. J. B. Logier.
Norfolk-street, Strand.
Dear Sir,
It gives me particular pleasure to assure you that I consider your invention of the Chiroplast as admirably calculated to lay the best foundation for forming the hand of the pupil in the true notions of touching the instrument for which it was intended. If wishing you every success possible, I remain, my dear Sir,
Yours, very sincerely,
J. B. CRAMER.
Friday, Sept. 2, 1814.

To Mr. Logier.
Becker-street, Sept. 14, 1814.
My Dear Sir,
It has long been lamented that many young Ladies who are formed by nature to express brilliancy and taste on the Piano Forte, have been impeded in their progress by grasping the elements of music with bad positions of the wrists and fingers during the absence of their instructors. In consequence of which, the exhibition of your Chiroplast, on Saturday last, afforded me astonishing pleasure. From its being a desideratum accomplished by the most simple means, and that you may experience a suitable reward for your ingenious discovery, in the sincere wish of
Yours, faithfully,
W. SHIELD.

To Mr. Logier.
Sir,
I feel much satisfaction in expressing my hearty and entire approval of your very ingenious and useful machine, denominated the Chiroplast, which I consider as a most valuable invention, and which cannot fail of producing the best and most desirable consequences of correct fingering, with a secure and graceful position of both hands in performing on a keyed instrument; the universal and infallible utility of which, as well as an immense saving of time and trouble to students, cannot but be obvious and self-evident to all candid lovers of improvement and of truth.
I am, Sir, Yours,
S. WESLEY.

To Mr. Logier.
Gower-place, Euston-square,
Thursday, Sept. 1, 1814.
Mr. KALLENBERGER begs leave to announce to the Public, that after the attentive investigation he has made into Mr. Logier's mode of tuition, feels himself warranted in declaring that nothing but prejudice, or want of knowledge of its true principles, can oppose any obstacles to its progress.

HOUSE OF LORDS, October 8.

"Fons amica hominibus quam inimica." But not so well in the abstract as to have any inclination to marry—she loved and cherished like a man over family, but there was one sweet man, one dear being whom she loved above all others, and he was the Italian gentleman, his name was Sacchi, who was so ungrateful as not to acknowledge it by any return. He indeed, believed her to be the most pure and perfect model, the chastest specimen of the character of a complete Swiss waiting-woman. When questioned as to having used certain expressions respecting the Princess not at all dreaming that letters containing those expressions were even in existence, and much less that they could ever be produced, she had denied having any such expressions. When the letters were produced she admitted the expression, but explained them to have been meant merely as equivocal, or double entendres; and in this too she and Sacchi resembled each other; both had their double entendres on this subject; she in her letters to her sister, and he, in his conversation with M. Marietti. In a subsequent part of her testimony her facility in acknowledging what she could no longer conceal, that she had made two contradictory statements, and that one was of course inconsistent with the truth, had called forth the warmest eulogium on her credibility. She had been asked, "Did you say that you were in want of money?"—Yes,—"And were you in want of money?"—"No." So that in point of fact, and from her own showing, there was not the smallest concession, in rerum natura, between a thing being true, and her saying it. And yet no little praise had been bestowed upon her for her admission in this part of her evidence, and that by a person of no common sagacity—he meant his Learned Friend the Solicitor-General. But for his own part he could hardly have ventured upon such a strain of address even to a man so far degraded below the level of the meanest capacity, as to be only fit for turning out into the fields the common companions of the dullest brute. How then could he ever have been prevailed upon to address any man of common sense in language such as this: "True, she has on a former occasion told lies; but then see the candour and ingenuousness with which she acknowledges it, in answer to the questions which you have put to her." He should not, indeed, have felt much surprise after this, at any person of weaker judgment and romantic feeling exclaiming, "Poor ingenious little Shepherdes of the mountains of Switzerland, how innocent a liar thou art!" But when he heard it gravely put, and strongly urged to persons sitting as judges in a case, to believe any thing that was said by a person whom they must know to be a liar from his own showing, and that on the ground of the ingenuousness of that person's acknowledgment of the falsehood of what he had before stated, he could not help exclaiming, that so monstrous, so unheard of a proposition, far outran all that he had ever conceived of what was absurd and extravagant. But the equivokes which she had wished them to believe she had designed as such, were utterly inconsistent in themselves and with each other; and as to the cypher by which they were to be explained, nothing of the kind could she show in the letters when called on to do so, and her not showing it proved it never to have existed. This species of conduct was like any thing rather than that of a person influenced by a sense of truth and justice. A plain man followed such devious paths, but pursued a straight and onward course confident in right, and firm in the truth. The fact was, she had found her service an agreeable one; she had been turned away, and she applied to get back again and was refused, and she afterwards fell into the hands of the conspirators. Much had been said, of attempts to calumniate the witnesses; but he would not calumniate her, he had no wish so to do; he would give her own account of herself. She had a young and virtuous sister just rising into life, for whose welfare she was fondly solicitous, that sister was in the service of the Princess and there she wished her above all things, to remain. Yet more, she had another sister still younger, not more than 17 years of age, whom she was anxious to see well provided, for and in her endeavours to accomplish that end she had no means untired of getting her also into the house, which if one little of what she had said at this bar were to be believed, she must have known to be worse, she would not say that any palace, but than any brothel. Such was her conduct from her own account. But he did not believe so badly of her as she had here represented her herself; he was far from thinking her so bad as in that case she must be; he believed her to have been sincere in what she had said in her letters to the Princess; he believed that she left her service with reluctance, and that she wished to get back
