this plea in Watson's case the lad spoke out sharply: "No, sir; not guilty." The judge looked up inquiringly. "Guilty, your honor," repeated Mr. Tweedie. "No, sir; not guilty,'

Then the lawyer stepped over to the cage and persuasively said to the roy in an undertone: "I'm pleading guilty or you, you know. The evidence is too strong against you." "No, sir," replied young Watson firmly; "I plead not guilty." A queer look wrinkled the judge's face, the lawyers smiled, spectators tittered, and Mr. Tweedie looked vered as he nodded assent to the prisoner's plea. The trial was proceeded with, and the jury's verdict was "Not guilty." So Watson was free, thanks to his nerve, and his associates were in prison.

The lawyers often worry Mr. Tweedie by humorous allusions to this court episode. It is not often that, a prisoner a acquitted after his lawyer has ered a ples of guilty in his behalf.

James Bruce of Moncton was more successful in the examinations at Mc-Gill than the meagra reference in the press despatches would indicate. In the aggregate Mr. Bruce got an easy first, having beaten Korr, the medalist seven out of nine Kerr, the medalist, seven out of nine subjects.
