The occasions that impress us most deply with the uncertainty of human life and the certainty of death, are visits to the sick, the house of mourning and the city of the dead. They first show us by what a slender chord life is held At the second we see the lifeless form, the eyes that are forever chesed. As we roam through the city of the dead we think of old friendships and bonds of love; we think of how death broke them asunder, deprived us of them. As we dwell upon these thoughts we ask why is it thus, but we answer not.

We think of life, of death and the vast forever, and we ask what is life we think but for a moment and in our sadness we murmer life is but a vapor that quickly
