Captain Brady.

Mr. Brady, one of the officers of the ill-fated Atlantic, displayed great skill and courage in saving the lives of the passengers. He was applauded and many men, accompanied by ladies, have been stopped on Eric street in that city by a colored woman, who asked them for "a dollar and forty cents dat you owe me for washing." The gentleman is gener ally so confused as to be unable to reply, and the lady looks on with surprise, while the shameless and guilty cause of discomfiture repeats her demand and enjoys the scene.

passengers. He was applauded and forgotten. His abilities appear not to have been recognized by his employers, for, instead of being in command, or second in command, of one of their steamships, he was recently a steerage passenger in the new American steamship Pennsylvania. A storm arose, the deck was swept by a tremendous sea, the Captain and the first and second officers were washed overboard, water ran down the open hatches, the third officer cowered in the cabin, and all was confusion, the demoralized crew and confusion, the demoralized crew and frightened passengers expecting certain destruction. But the ship earried Brady and his fortunes—in the steerage. Mr. Brady assumed command, had the engines slowed, slightly changed the course of the ship, and order, discipline, and a sense of security reigned in the place of terror and confusion. The waves washed over the deck and down the open hatches no longer, because a sailorwas directingthe ship's movements. The Directors of the American Steam—

Another incompetent American will, probably, get the command, and Brady be left to seek a situation where merit is recognized at its value.
