How To Launch a Career For The 1990s

by Norman "Mother" Vincent Peel

The rat race will get even faster in the 1990s, so here are some tips to keep all you sprinters in top form.

Keep your briefcase in hand at all times. If you can't fill it with enough important looking files, use phone books to give it that extra important heft. Wear any kind of coordinated outfit.

Decide to go to law school, and moonlight as a salesperson all at once. One must keep one's agenda full. The fuller your calendar, the more important you are. If all above fails, become a customs officer. Kiss everybody's ass with the strength of an industrial vacuum cleaner. Be condescending to the opposite sex, children and all those not your own height.

Make emergency phone calls from any phone anywhere, except your home phone. And remember, never return a call, let them call you. Pass out your business card everywhere, even in the washroom, and the title on your business card should be very self-important and obscure as to what you really do.

Wear enough scent to fumigate a small apartment. If you run out of Glade, Raid or Pledge will do. Carry hairspray wherever you go.

Cultivate aggression by imagining you are being pursued by a rabid dog. Emit moisture when speaking to make sure you have people's attention. Attend all conferences, even with titles like "Creative Lifestyle Self-Activism." It looks good on your resume.

Speaking of resume, we hear that 10 page resumes go over really well in the job market. Don't forget to include grammar school through high school, especially extra-curricular activities like skipping rope, hops-cotch and the babysitting course you took.

If all of the above fails, get a position in the family business or buy a job.

UP IN SMOKE WITH HARRY

In a joint decision with the office of student affairs, president Hairy Armpits has decided to legalize marijuana on campus. "It'll be groovy," he said, before he fell asleep at the press conference. Armpits also announced that drag racing would soon be a weekly event in Central Square and that he wished he were young again so he could enjoy it.

PUT A SOCK IN IT

York science professor Joseph P. Brainy has made a startling discovery. He has found the mysterious void which socks travel to after being lost in the clothes dryer. He said it is not a pretty place, but that the look is "nothing compared to the smell."
