been written and said about the North West for some time past, that your readers must be about tired of the subject—and well they may, for there certainly has been a great deal said and written that would have been better left alone. Some writers have been making an almost unbroken plain of tropical soil and climate of the North West—and one has gone into something like heroics in describing how peacefully our noble red men bear the pangs of hunger; and how gracefully, they submit to any privations, rather than disturb the peace of this Western Prairie.

These things are very nice and poetical and rapid communications to the representation of read well; but no greater mistake can be made than to suppose that ALL the land in this great North West is of first rate quality—or that even all within what is known as the "fertile belt" is fir for farming purposes. The fact is, that when settlements become numerous, and nearer 40 each other than they are now, a heavy percentage of the area of the country will be found of little use to the first settlers. In not a few parts of the country stony and dry ridges are freduent—with so light a soil as the some six and soil as the country stony and dry ridges are freduent—with so light a soil as the some six and soil as the cheff of the representation of the republicant and captain stable to the first new barlington.

Soil, probably, equal to anything on the continent, but unavailable until drained, and owing to the general flatness of such localities as these marshes occur in, the draining of them will be so, expensive an operation that it will have to remain undone until there is more money in the country than there is likely to be among the first settlers in it. When these facts are taken and to consideration it will be seen that even if all the available and good land along the line of the Canada Pacific Railway as at present allotted to actual settlement and pre-emption, was taken up and occupied, the inhabitants along the line of the grear national roads would be few and allow them.

We are told by the member for Glengary that the actual settler is a land speculator, (it is only charitable to hope that Mr. McLennand was suffering from an attack of the spleen when he enunciated such a dogma; it should make his name immortal), but if he is, there should be some discrimination made between the speculator who is lead by rather than leads, the content of the first than leads, the content of the speculator who is lead by rather than leads, the content of and hard labor generally on his land, and the absence who carries out his business, it may be a thousand unles away from the country in a snug office.
