Coyottes are unusually pleutiful in the district this autumn, and that too, despite the non-appearance of the usually abundant rabbit, due to the prevalence of the plague this year. Ten of these prairie scavengers were noted in less than two hours during a tramp of a few miles recently.

The nuisance known as the city creek will soon be no more—no more flooding of cellars; no more dumping of all sorts of garbage into its deathladen puddles; no more unspeakable smells. The course is to be changed entirely and a proper drainage ditch will be dug. The work is not expected to cost much on account of the city not having to purchase any right of way, or private property. The latter with civic spirit has been donated for the general good.
