If There Had Been No War.

Had peace continued, General Foch would still be conducting his classes at the Paris Higher Military School, an amiable Professor unknown outside a small circle, and patronisingly dubbed by the military wisecracks the "armchair strategist."
Generals Petain and Nivelle would be leading the placid life of retired colonels on inadequate pensions, with no laurels to proclaim their long service to France.
Marshal Joffre would probably be spending his last years in the peace of his native village of Rivesaltes, beloved as "Papa" Joffre, but unknown to fame; and M. Clemenceau would have found a final refuge from a long and turbulent political life in the editorial room of L'Asire.
Sir Douglas Haig would be slowly climbing the Generals' list, a popular man at Court, and in West End drawing rooms, but scarcely a name to the "man in the street." Sir William Robertson would be known to military officers only as a man who, by god and conscientious work, had blossomed from private to Major-General; and Sir Julian Byng would be known to the army as a soldier of promise and meritorious service.
Sir Henry Wilson would be plodding away modestly and conscientiously as a Brigadier skilled in the science of soldiering; Generals Allenby, Monro, Horne, Trenchard, Salmon and Sykes would be as little known to the outside world as scores of other men of similar rank whose names are still only read in the Army Lists. And the "man in the street" would look blankly at you if you mentioned the names of Jellicoe, Beatty, Wemyss and Keyes, good sailormen all, but as far removed from world-wide recognition as from Mars.
In the civilian world Sir Eric Geddes would be sitting in the chair of Deputy Manager of a great railway, probably unable to tell you the badges of a Vice-Admiral or Major-General, which he has won and worn; or the most elementary duties of First Lord of the Admiralty. And his brother, Sir Auckland, would still be lecturing on anatomy in Montreal.

Police Changes At Curling.

(Western Star).
District Inspector I. Bartlett retired from the police force with the end of October. Mr. Bartlett has been a member of the constabulary for over forty years, a great deal of which time he has been stationed here.
About fifteen years ago he was appointed District Inspector for this section of the country. He is being succeeded by Head Constable Peet, who assumed duties the first of the present month. Mr. Peet is not a stranger to Bay of Islands, he having done police duties here in the early days of his joining the force. We understand some police promotions are slated to take place which will include a D. I. for him.
