CHAPTER XVIII.

WHICH EXPLAINS THE CAUSE OF LILLIAS GIBSON'S GRIEF.

In order properly to understand the cause of Lillias Gibson's excessive and vehement agitation, it will be necessary to describe a scene which took place at an earlier hour on that same evening. While George was enjoying himself so much with his new found friends, Mathew Greigson and his wife, Lillias was receiving a shock which brought at once darkness, sorrow and misery on her young life, and plunged her into that condition of distress in which she was found by George.

She was sitting in the gloaming in her own little room by a bright fire, which revealed the beaming beauty of her face as in solitude and seclusion she indulged in the sweetest meditations which a maiden's heart can know. In that heart love for George Eglington had been formed and developed with steady growth. It had crept in there very quietly and without observation, even to herself. Many things had conspired to cause it so to do. George's own personal qualities and mental and moral features were, of course, the chief means of producing it, but certain circumstances, which we have not yet revealed to the reader, had operated in a way to cause her love to go forth more readily and easily—to draw her freely, naturally, and with pleasure towards him—at the very first, and to render her peculiarly susceptible to the attractive influences which the youth's character and disposition naturally exerted.

Not that Lillias was as first conscious of the real nature of the feelings which were coming upon her, or understood the point to which they were sure to tend. She was too guileless and artless for that, and it is probable that had her perception reached forward in that way, she would have been far more guarded, reserved, and restrained. But it was in the very purity, simplicity and kindness of her nature, that she put herself in that free and familiar position with George, which speedily evoked on both sides, that affection which was in truth the natural result of such close association.

She had come to understand the truth better now. Her love had revealed itself to her, and it gave her only joy and delight, for even still the issues were not thought of by her. Its mere presence—its existence—were all that had possession of her consciousness, and that was enough to fill her whole being, to give her a sweet, delicious satisfaction which no thought of ulterior result had disturbed. It was so very, very exquisite to experience that deep felicity of soul which accompanies a pure and noble affection, and to bask in the radiance which it spread throughout her being. It was her pride and joy to love George, for he was worthy of that love. In her eyes he was all excellence—in him her ideal of manhood was realized. She had found nothing in him which disappointed her, nothing which she could not approve, but everything that her nature taught her to admire and reverence. Why then should she feel aught but joy in loving him? Why should she hesitate to confess to flow forth towards him the whole affection of her soul? One thing alone would have checked this full and guiding overflow, and that was a coldness or indifference on George's part.—Had he manifested in the slightest degree a restraint in reciprocating her regard and the tendency of her feelings, she would have been intensely sensitive to the first and faintest shade of indifference, and shrunk back into herself forever.

But George, as we have already hinted, manifested no such hesitation to return her proffered friendliness. On the contrary, his heart was not less responsive than her own; and, without one thought of what was likely to be the end or the result, they gave themselves up to that close and fond intercourse, which increased every day the love which now had a place in her bosom.

They were mutually conscious, mutually certain of it, though it had not yet been avowed in words. To have spoken of what was likely to be the end or the result, they gave themselves up to that close and fond intercourse, which increased every day the love which now had a place in her bosom.
