LIGHT BRAHMAS.

This magnificent breed of fowls has for many years been the most popular on this continent.—Writers never seem to tire of dilating on their beauties and merits. Every point has been the subject of lengthy and able discussions. We believe they attain the greatest average weight; will produce as many, if not more, eggs than any other of the Asiatic class, and are not such persistent sitters as some; they are very docile and contented in confinement, and the hens, when not too heavy are good mothers.

The following description, and hints for mating

THE COCK.—His head should be small and fine, with a slight fullness over the eye; long, narrow, snaky heads should be carefully avoided. The head should be surmounted by a small, low pea comb. It should be lower in front and rear than in the centre, and extending back about as far as the eyes, and set firmly upon the head. The beak should be short and rather stout, like the beak of a grouse. The upper mandible should have a dark horn-colored stripe down the centre; the young
