

Who can envisage a conventional war in Europe which does not consume the prize?

Who can construct a solution to the debt crisis which does not involve compromise?

Who can foresee a cleaner global environment without international cooperation and joint action?

And who can imagine a resolution of the many crises in the developing world without a reasoned and productive dialogue with the developed world?

In the past, it was the adherents of unilateralism who were known as realists and the advocates of co-operation who were labelled idealists.

I submit that the reverse is now the case.

Co-operation is now the new realism, and pragmatism is the path to progress.

Much has been accomplished in recent months and years; much more remains to be done.

Within the East-West relationship, there is a new willingness to abandon sterile linkages, and to seek solutions to tractable problems even when other areas remain contentious.

This welcome attitude has invigorated this institution and brought hope to many conflicts and regions of the world. We encourage its continuance.

Arms control is now characterized by real compromise and give and take. Problems which are truly acute are being addressed first. Areas where technology threatens to overtake politics are being given priority. And the unnecessarily large and undesirably unstable balance in conventional forces is finally being dealt with head-on.

Canada warmly welcomes the significant progress made in recent days by the United States and the Soviet Union on a variety of fundamental issues.

In particular, movement towards the abandonment of the linkage between research on strategic defence and progress on strategic nuclear arms control is a very positive development.
