Men's Felt Hats---a "Still" Exhibit

From the fur of which they are made to the new style Fedoras—every stage of their manufacture is shown in this exhibit--the actual process in which the blowing about of bits of fur is intensified by the whirring of machinery being impractical for demonstration in the department. The huge cone with fur blown on the hat, felted and about half the original size, colored and stiffened, blocked and pressed--these are the various stages shown by photographs of the machinery in operation. By way of contrast there is an old box used for blowing the fire fifty years ago.

GERMANY'S OLD ARMY ALMOST DEMOBILIZED

Intend to Keep 450,000 Men Under Arms as a Standing Force.

London, Feb. 13.—The demobilization of Germany's old army is almost completed, according to authoritative information here. After Saturday, when the 1916 and 1917 classes will be disbanded, the German army will consist of about 100,000 men on the eastern front and the 1918 and 1919 classes, numbering about 450,000 men, which will be kept as a standing army.

Efforts of the German authorities to recruit volunteers for the army have been unproductive, but the official view here is that they may be more successful later. Men who have been in the army for four years, do not have a great desire to continue in the fighting force, but it is expected that they will find civil life in Germany less attractive than the army, and, therefore, probably will be willing to enlist later. Recruiting also is hindered by the fact that nearly every peasant is trying to raise his own defence force. Many former soldiers are joining the local forces and are staying at home to protect the home community, rather than join the national force.

The German force on the eastern frontier is divided into two armies. The northern headquarters at Bromberg is commanded by General von Quast. The southern force under Field Marshal von Weyersach is at Segau. Field Marshal von Hindenburg has not yet arrived at Koblenz. German main headquarters in the

BOLSHEVIST LEADER NOW UNDER ARREST

Documents, When Karl Radek Was Discovered, Show Plot for Uprising in Germany.

Berne, Feb. 13.—Karl Radek, the Russian Bolshevist emissary, who has been accused by the German authorities of being an instigator of numerous radical outbreaks in German territory, has been discovered and arrested by the Berlin police in Charlottenburg, according to a Berlin despatch today. His whereabouts had been a mystery for some time.

A nation-wide insurrection in Germany, aided by a Russian Bolshevist army, has been planned for March, it was revealed in documents discovered when Radek was arrested.

The documents, it was said, show that the proposed Spartacist uprising would be the signal for the Russians to cross the German frontier and ensure the revolution. Radek, who was one of Karl Liebknecht's lieutenants in the recent Berlin revolt, eluded the government police. His hiding place in a villa in Charlottenburg was discovered by watching the movements of his secretary, Lina Becker. She was also arrested.
