A. G. Turner, provincial horticulturist, in the city yesterday, said the outlook for the coming year was good, as far as could be told at this time of year. There would be an increase in the acreage of orchards in the province but how great this would be he could not tell until after the convention of the fruit growers in Fredericton next week.

SPELL MAN IN FOR ANOTHER WEEK

Does Not Like Jail Nor Food There But Will Not Give Evidence

Thomas Spellman again refused to give evidence in the case against Cornelius McHugh, charged with having sold liquor to Spellman, a minor. The information was given by Spellman himself who now refuses to give evidence. When he refused to answer this morning whether or not he had been in McHugh's bar room on a certain date, George A. Henderson, who is conducting the examination, asked him if he liked the food he was getting in jail. The prisoner replied that he did not. He also said that he would much rather be out working for his own living. He was then asked why he refused to answer the questions of the court since he would rather have his freedom than remain in jail. This question Spellman declined to answer and he was again sent to jail for seven days.

"AS YOU LIKE IT" IS CHARMINGLY GIVEN BY MARGARET ANGLIN

Shakespeare Comedy Delightfully Presented at His Majesty's Theatre in Montreal

The Montreal Mail has the following of interest here:—
"As you like it" was never presented more sympathetically in Montreal than it was last night. Margaret Anglin played the comedy at His Majesty's theatre to mere handfuls of people, but the production did not suffer because the audience did not suffer because the audience was slender. One may say, faithfully say, that the presentation was in accord with the best traditions, and yet it carried a touch of personality throughout.

Miss Anglin deserves much credit for her courage in engaging in a Shakespearean revival these days when they say the bard of Avon is out of fashion, but more than that, she deserves credit for presenting a sympathetic interpretation coupled with the best examples of modern stage art.

Her Art Not Exclusive

Miss Anglin's art is evidently not exclusive. To play Viola one night and Rosalind the next may strike many people as being a comparatively easy task, but the slightest consideration of the two roles will convince anybody that the case lies with the imagination of the audience rather than will the player.

Miss Anglin's art to put the point more concisely, is an art, which neither limits itself to any personal style nor an art, which lends itself readily to identification. She identifies herself with the part she is playing. She is not only willing but anxious to sink her personality. There is never at any period, the slightest suggestion that Margaret Anglin, as Viola, or as Rosamond, desires her audience to recognize her as Margaret Anglin, the actress, or as Viola, who played the leading female role the night before.

Rosalind Is Human

Her Rosalind is, primarily, intensely human. She neither emphasizes its feminine features nor attracts undue attention to the duplicity of the role. She does succeed, however, in conveying to her audience a very definite and very intelligent suggestion of the girl who, having adopted male attire for convenience sake—to say no more—neither so far forgets her sex as to attempt a deliberate masquerade nor degrades it to the status of glorifying in her temporary masculine activities.

In a word, her Rosalind possesses all the qualities that one anticipates in so glorious a creature. Her Rosalind also manifests all the artifices one readily forgives in the Rosalind of the play. We cannot have her all the time, everything that we desire. We can realize, and she allows us to realize, that her Rosalind is in the ultimate consideration, essentially feminine, essentially human, and delightfully womanly.

The boys were in charge of D. Milligan, secretary of the boys' department. They drove as far as Newcombe's and on returning to the city were served a hearty supper at the Y.
