What We Owe to the Men

Who Keep Up Steam in Our Battleships.

Right down in the lull of the great battleship, securely shut down by water-tight doors, they see nothing of the fight. For them the thrill of battle comes in a sudden and stern increase of their strenuous duties. Yet let us never forget what we owe to the men whose work is so vitally essential to the success of every naval action.

Their work is so heavy, indeed, that the men are divided into three watches so as to give them an eight hours' rest between their four hours' spells of labor.

Down in the engine-room there are steampipes, filled with scalding water and sudden death, flooding the engine-room in an instant with biting, blinding, searing fog, somewhere above boiling point, for high pressure steam is hotter stuff than comes out of the spout of a kettle. A shell through the main steam pipes, and good-bye to those who are near the damage.

The engineer officer knows all this, and often has seen some of the things that can happen taking place on a small scale. While the gunners are working for all they are worth he watches the wheels go round, listens not to the

of the hammer strokes of projectiles on armour-plate, but to the tell-tale songs of the complex mechanisms over which he presides with the coolness of a naval officer, the skill of a man of science, and the tenderness of a Red Cross nurse.

He never sees a shot go home; he never sees an enemy's flag pulled down in defeat. If all goes well, and the enemy runs or strikes, the engineer-commander hears all about it at mess. If things go wrong, he feels it—quite unmistakably—in his person.

Get one unlucky shot into the engine-room, and it is up to him, so long as volition is left to him, to put that thing right, and he must now draw fires until there is not another thing he can do first. In battle, so long as there is a dog's chance to do so, he

for steam is the breath of life to the ship, and he must take risks, when he is making repairs, that would give the landsman spasms. It may be remembered that a storm suddenly burst out at a time when quite a fleet of warships were anchored in the harbor of Apia. So fearful was the gale that six vessels were blown ashore and completely wrecked. The Calliope, however, cut her cable and steamed out in the teeth of the hurricane, and was the only ship that escaped that awful night. In spite of the gigantic sea that was running the stokers managed for hour after hour to keep up a full head of steam. So frightful was the fury of that blast that at times the vessel actually stood still, the full power of her engines barely equalling the tremendous pressure of the wind. It was only a few yards that she escaped the jagged coral rocks, and finally forced her way out into the comparative safety of the open sea. During the fearful struggle, down in the engine-room

The Scene Was an Inferno.

Men were flung from one side to the other, and many were badly bruised, burnt, or scalded. Yet they stuck to their work like the heroes they were, and for eighteen hours on end continued to keep up full steam. At last the weather moderated, and they were able to run for Port Blair.

At the battle of the Falkland Islands the Kent, it is said, exceeded her contract speed by two knots. What this means can hardly be explained to anyone who is not familiar with an engine-room—especially the cramped engine-room of a warship.

The American Germans have been sure, and more than sure, that the sinking of the "Arabic" was right and more than right, while they know beyond the shadow of a doubt that the act of the man who sank her wouldn't be criticised at home, and that the reputation of it would not be forbidden. The German Germans of greatest authority, however, seem to have been certain only that if the "Arabic" was sunk by a submarine in the conditions which the American Germans held to be full justification, then the commander of the submarine violated his instructions and imposed upon his Government the hard necessity to express a deep regret for his misbehavior. The situation thus created for the American Germans is truly a trying one—the more trying because, for those not ensnared therein, it constitutes almost if not quite the first "humor" of the war. Whatever the final action of the German Government may be, they are already in the deep hole of their own digging.
