When Freiburg, which is an "open town," though not an undefended one, suffers from bombardment by a fleet of British airplanes, the Germans use, in describing the deaths of women, children, and a few other non-combatants that follow, exactly the same terms and manifest exactly the same indignation which we become familiar with when the Germans themselves began this form of warfare in both France and England.

The only reason for criticism of these characterizations and for failing to share the resentments expressed is that the Germans long since lost the right to protest against anything of this sort that the Allies may do. That, however, does not settle the matter, except for the Germans. In other nations the subject of reprisals is kind, and especially in this kind, is still open to discussion.

Such reprisals have only one justification. When they can be made or treated in such a way as to prevent the original offender from repeating a brutal or cruel act, then they are not to be condemned, though even then the necessity for them is deeply to be regretted by any belligerent that aspires to fight in accordance with the laws of war and to keep the evils of war as near as possible to the irreducible minimum. But when the only effect reasonably to be expected from a reprisal is an effort on the part of the enemy to revenge his still more savage when there is no injury by the infliction of injuries reasonable expectation that he will be frightened or subdued by his own sufferings and losses—then reprisals in kind simply start a rivalry in which the nation of better intentions and greater decency is sure to be beaten, and the excuse for them becomes tenuous to the disappearing point.

The punishment imposed on Freiburg for the sinking of British hospital ships is a form of "justice" that is entirely too "wild," since it falls on people who did not participate in the part of the enemy to revenge his still more savage when there is no injury by the infliction of injuries reasonable expectation that he will be frightened or subdued by his own sufferings and losses—then reprisals in kind simply start a rivalry in which the nation of better intentions and greater decency is sure to be beaten, and the excuse for them becomes tenuous to the disappearing point.

Lloyd George's Inspiring Speech.

that the loyal myriads should feel not as if they were a subject race in the Empire, but partners in the nation. All these questions require bold statesmanship. Timidity or faint-heartedness, abhorrent in peace, is fatal in war. Britain faced the problems of the war with amazing courage. She must face the problems of peace with the same great spirit. I thank you, Lord Mayor and Council of this great city, not merely for the personal honor but for the encouragement coming from seeing men who once fought each other, working side by side for the great end. May that comradeship endure not merely to triumphant victory, but until the devastation of the war has been repaired and the fruits of a glorious victory have been gathered.

At the luncheon following the ceremony conferring the freedom of the City upon the Premier, Lloyd George said, I do not want anyone to feel that things being all right there is nothing more to do. That is one of the real difficulties. Exaggeration causes panic. On the other hand, if things are painted in their true colors, and we begin saying we shall pull through with an effort, people will say let somebody else make the effort; I will do the pulling through. Success is assured only if everyone does his share. The men who put party victory before war victory are few. Nevertheless sometimes you feel that party here. I am not going to make an application, but those who think all party feeling is so completely submerged, that we can sail over the whole ocean with impunity have only got to watch. They will see here a little swirl, there a jagged rock. We will endeavor to avoid them and we will bury them, but if we find them impeding the nation's navigation, there is enough explosive temper in this land to blow them up and fetch the cargo safely through.
