

HELEN MOIR

LOVE AND HONOUR.

A TALE OF THE CLYDE.

CHAPTER XXII.

For nearly half an hour the storm, such as we have described it, went on without visible abatement. It was directly overhead, and to the two watchers in the rocky recess seemed confined to their own glen, though had they been in the adjoining Glen Leon, or by the sides of Loch Eck or the shores of Loch Long, they would have found that it raged there with the same intensity. That it was very close to them, however, was proved by one of the thunderbolts striking a crag within their sight, splintering a portion of its surface into fragments, which rolled to its base. A fearful look passed between them at the sight of this, for if the crag under which they were sheltered was struck in the same way it might result in their destruction.

At length the thunder-cloud, while it settled more densely on the hills at the top of the glen, lighted towards the south and the indication of the storm passing. From this moment the gloom lessened, then the intervals between the thunder-peals returned and grew longer, the torrent of rain subsided, and soon the edge of the cloud was seen fringed with white. Dis- tant and more distant grew the reverberations, and, as the sounding air quieted, thence of the streams which had been so suddenly called into existence was more distinctly heard as they rushed along. Presently the blue sky, bright and beautiful, was seen above Benmore, and the nearer hills became again clear and distinct. Finally the sun burst forth, the clouds broke into white masses, which rolled slowly away over the crests; the songsters, whose warbling notes the storm had hushed, left their hiding places, and made the air vocal with joyous melody; and all Nature, roused to beautiful, and made fragrant with incense, smiled in deepened peace after the elemental war.

At the earliest possible moment Hermann and Helen quitted their place of shelter and picked their way towards the road. They knew how alarmed the inmates of the villa were by their account, and hurried forward to relieve their anxiety. They had little more than quitted the glen, however, when they met Mr. Bridgenorth, Edwin and Ritchie on the way to meet them. Their anxiety had, indeed, been extreme, and equally glad were they to see them safe and un- harmed.

The time till Monday passed all too quickly away. Every one was in view of Hermann's departure and the danger he was about to enter. On Sunday evening, Edwin mitigated the general despondency in some degree by intimating that he had resolved to go as a spectator to the seat of war. He had been in consultation with Ritchie on the subject, and Ritchie had engaged to accompany him as personal attendant. Their presence might serve nothing to avert danger from Hermann; still it was a comfort to know that they were near him, and through them those left behind would have constant intelligence respecting him. The two non-combatants could not go with Hermann on the morrow—the arrangements they had to make would not admit of that; but they would follow as quickly as possible, and hoped to be in Germany before any serious battle was fought.

It was further arranged that for the present Mrs. Allerton, Mr. Bridgenorth, and Helen should remain in the villa at Ardenadam. It was a quiet, pleasant place at which to wait for intelligence as to the progress of the war, and of Hermann's fortunes as a soldier. It was a place dear to them for its holy and deeply cherished memories, and its sweet and sorrowful associations. There they had experienced much happiness and much pain, and they thought they could better endure there than elsewhere the suspense and anguish of heart which must be their portion so long as the dear one whom they loved was exposed to the perils and dangers of war.
