CHAPTER XXIII.
A TERRIBLE INTERVIEW.
"Are you mad?" whispered the factor, with vehement energy. "Would you ruin us both? He is candidly telling the truth, and would you lose the chance we have of protecting our position? Dismiss him and we may miss the vital information. The boy may live as well as the girl; and is it not all-important for us to know it? For heavens sake, be careful—he wily, or all may be lost."
"But can it be possible?" said Stephen, dubiously. "Did you not make all possible search and could learn nothing?"
"I did. But what of it? I may not have got on the right track. Now is our time to learn the truth; and you will ruin us both if in your rage you lose it."
"Then I will choke down my rage till we learn more," muttered Stephen, and, turning, he again confronted Harry.
"Go on, sir," he said; "I am waiting to hear what further you have to say. Whether your story be true or false you have proved my enemy, and most if it be true, for in that case you have offered me the deepest insult, and most deliberate irreparable injury. You knew how I and my family hated the very name of Bruce; you know what my cousin lost and incurred by marrying the painter, and by your own declaration you have married the offspring of that accursed union."
"Young as I was when I left Ardgowan," said Harry, "I had learned not to share in the sinful feeling which you cherished towards your cousin and Kenneth Bruce. My heart was made sad and indignant when I thought of the cruelties and wrongs they had suffered at your hands, and the older I grew the stronger did this feeling become."
"Oh, indeed?" said his father, with a sneer. "And in the ardour of your virtuous indignation you set yourself to hunt out the crew, in order that you might make amends for these imagined wrongs by giving them your name and fortune! Of course they saw the egregious simplicity they had to deal with—of course they flattered and coaxed you—of course they set their wits to work to deceive you, and the mix, worthy of her base origin, did it; and now—"
"Stop, father!" cried Harry, and his face so blazed with scorn and righteous anger that the other was silenced. "I came here with no intention to upbraid or criminate, though the temptation is strong, and your words are making it stronger. But to deprive you of all pretence for using language which is in no case justifiable, let me tell you that while Kenneth Bruce lived, I knew not who he was, and knew not who I was. When I went to Edinburgh I dropped the name of Gibson, of which I was in no way proud, and was known only by that of Markham. Kenneth Bruce also went by another name, and with his family, lived in perfect retirement. I was fortunate enough to make their acquaintance, and learned to love their daughter, the purest and noblest of her sex. It was not many days before our marriage that I learned the truth, and not till after we were united did I inform her of my name and family. Now, sir, I hope you will rail no more against imaginary unworthiness."
"If my railing, as you call it, is to be turned from one direction, it can only be to go more violently in another. I thought at first you were a simpleton and a fool in the business: now I find you a deliberate traitor and rebel. You—a son of mine—contrived an intimacy with and offered marriage to an obscure, penniless, low-born girl. This was vile enough, but having learned who she was, who her father was, still you married her."
"Still I married her!" echoed Harry. "When I knew who she was, and who her father had been, I was only the more ready, the more eager to marry her."
"Aye, to spite and anger me."
"No, but to do something to atone for the wrongs her poor unfortunate parents suffered at your hands."
"Curse it, do you come here to tell me this again? burst out his father in the maddest rage, when once more Nathan Garret essayed to recall him to prudence."
"Would it not be well, sir," he observed, "to learn from your son how he discovered the identity of Kenneth Bruce and his daughter? Ask him about this," he added in a whisper. "We may thus learn tidings of the boy."
Stephen Gibson was not so far under the influence of his passion as to prevent him from recognising the importance of this advice. He therefore turned again to Harry, and coldly asked for particulars on this point.
