variety field, which he had agreed upon with Martin Beck.

Next comes one of the brightest little sprites that Martin Beck has in his galaxy of stars—Flavilla, "the Dancing Accordeon Girl." As her name implies, this handsome little girl playes a full-size accordeon as she executes some very difficult dancing.

Cordeon as she executes some very difficult dancing.

Bogert and Nelson, known to thousands as fun-makers, will appear in what is said to be their best vehicle. It is a sketch with a travesty on minstrels in two acts, entitled, "The Busiest Day of His Lifte," and if you don't laugh, you are a non-curable case of the blues.

The Woods and Woods trio of wire artists are among the topnotchers of their class and in addition are wise enough to depart from the usual routine and work their stunts into a neat sketch, which they dall "An Elopement by Wire."

"LITTLE MISS BROWN"

On the regular vaudeville bill we find This little girl, who reaches a strange sch On the regular vaudeville bill we find Madame Olga Petrova, the wonderful Russian-Polish actress, as the headliner. Madame Petrova is a beautiful and versatile woman, whose talents range from the sublime to the other extreme of comedy and she is, in addition, the possessor of a splendid singing voice, which she can put to an almost uncanny use by employing it in four different registers.

When Percival Knight wrote "Detective Keen," he had no idea that it would be later on the vaudeville stage, but put his best efforts into the "crook" of the sketch for the actor's benefit. When it was enacted in Boston and New York, Daniel Frohman saw it and at once engaged it for the first venture into the variety field, which he had agreed upon with Martin Beck.

No attempt has even been made to compare it with the German and French farces on which most of the American brand of farcical entertainment is based, because it is wholly different. It is strictly American in theme and in treatment. The freshness and simplicity of the lines never fall to leave pleasant recollections behind.
