

degree compensated by the inconceivable rapidity with which the days seem to lengthen when once the sun has re-appeared. There is, indeed, no change which continues to excite so much surprise as that from almost constant darkness to constant day; and this is, of course, the more sudden and striking, in proportion to the height of the latitude. Even in this comparatively low parallel, the change seemed sufficiently remarkable; for soon after the middle of March, only ten weeks after the sun's re-appearance above the horizon, a bright twilight appeared at midnight in the northern heavens.

END OF THE THIRD VOLUME.

---

London: W. CLOWES, Stamford Street.