Lord Revelstoke, another member of the delegation, represents great financial interests, and comes of a family which for generations has had a part in all Anglo-Russian financing.

Gen. Wilson, the third of the British envoys, is considered one of the brainlest of Britain's military leaders. Wilson and Gen. Castelnau of the French staff, who is also there to explain the plans and views of the western Allies, will be in a position to reach unity of military action with the Russian high command such as has hitherto been impossible, because of the delays in communication. The effect of this is expected to show as soon as the spring fighting gets under way.
