FAMOUS CRIMINAL DEAD IN FRANCE
Proved Patriotism During Late War by Stealing Important Paper.

Paris, March 14.—One of the most picturesque criminal careers on record has come to an end at the Ile de Reconvict prison, on the Bay of Biscay, with the death of Baptiste Travill, who was recently sentenced to ten years' imprisonment as a member of the notorious bandit gang of La Villette. Among the exploits of this expert French cracksmen were the holding up of the Indian mail train between Paris and Marseilles, and a theft of 200,000 francs from the strong-room of an ocean liner. But Travill had at any two redeeming features—patriotism and courage in his country's service, for on one occasion he exercised his criminal skill in the cause of France and her Allies.
It was an enterprise which none but the most expert criminal could have carried out, in which discovery meant death. Yet when he was offered a large monetary reward for having succeeded in it he refused to take a penny. During the war he was at Berne, where he came into contact with enemy spies and with the counter-espionage service.

or some other darned thing? the veteran parliamentarian demanded aloud laughter. "Nobody wants to stop smiling, or to discountenance the exuberance of youth, but, for goodness sake, don't make it the whole thing of existence."
Sir George was speaking on "Our British Empire." "In this great war, let him who will claim the victory; we know that if it had not been for the help of our allies, the British Empire would have been different than it is with the contest with the Hun," he said.
"Talk as you will of Britain's diminished prestige, and its lessening influence in the councils of the world, it is my belief that no country in the world exercises a greater influence for sanity and stability than the British after the war."
A Look Ahead.
Looking forward, he saw in one hundred years Great Britain with sixty millions within its borders, Canada with one hundred millions, Australia with sixty millions. He saw the need of emphasizing in the mind of the British the fact that when he leaves his native shores he does not need to leave the Empire. The Empire is now a unity which can produce within its borders everything it needs, and in twenty-five years cotton would be produced in large quantities. "Today unemployment is a menace to British power," he said. "What if it acts in the end as a dispersion of man power from the congested parts of the Empire to other places where it is needed?" The Labor Ministry in England appeared to him as a working out of a great purpose, and the thrusting of responsibility upon the shoulders of those who heretofore have been radical, making them realize that they had a duty to perform in the Empire.
"Let Canada get the habit of taking a comparative view of things. You can't hope that out of the inferno of world war everything will come all right in a year, or a generation," he reminded. "We might very well revive the old homely virtues by which this country grew—thrift, work and contentment with profits—and dispense with this awful haze which seems to require that all the joys of life must be lapped up in half an hour."

or some other darned thing? the veteran parliamentarian demanded aloud laughter. "Nobody wants to stop smiling, or to discountenance the exuberance of youth, but, for goodness sake, don't make it the whole thing of existence."
Sir George was speaking on "Our British Empire." "In this great war, let him who will claim the victory; we know that if it had not been for the help of our allies, the British Empire would have been different than it is with the contest with the Hun," he said.
"Talk as you will of Britain's diminished prestige, and its lessening influence in the councils of the world, it is my belief that no country in the world exercises a greater influence for sanity and stability than the British after the war."
A Look Ahead.
Looking forward, he saw in one hundred years Great Britain with sixty millions within its borders, Canada with one hundred millions, Australia with sixty millions. He saw the need of emphasizing in the mind of the British the fact that when he leaves his native shores he does not need to leave the Empire. The Empire is now a unity which can produce within its borders everything it needs, and in twenty-five years cotton would be produced in large quantities. "Today unemployment is a menace to British power," he said. "What if it acts in the end as a dispersion of man power from the congested parts of the Empire to other places where it is needed?" The Labor Ministry in England appeared to him as a working out of a great purpose, and the thrusting of responsibility upon the shoulders of those who heretofore have been radical, making them realize that they had a duty to perform in the Empire.
