

DOCTOR JACK

By George H. Stone.

Jack was a young man of about thirty years of age, and was a very handsome fellow. He was a doctor, and was very successful in his profession. He had a very large practice, and was very well known in the city.

One day he was sitting in his office, and was reading a book. He was very much interested in the book, and was reading it very carefully. He was sitting there for some time, and was very much absorbed in the book.

He was sitting there for some time, and was very much absorbed in the book. He was sitting there for some time, and was very much absorbed in the book. He was sitting there for some time, and was very much absorbed in the book.

They ought to have a good run of custom on this road if they supply meals like that," declares the elder lady, her eager eyes taking in the contents of the basket.

Larry looks up, meets the gaze of Avis, sees an interrogation point in her eyes, and then points his thumb back over his shoulder in the direction of Doctor Jack, just now deeply engaged in taking a nap. For poor fellow, he has not had a wink of sleep the preceding night.

These things fly through Jack's brain, and his first impulse is to stop his own vehicle. Then he dismounts, and at sight of him Larry utters an exclamation, and would throw his arms around the neck of Doctor Jack did not that worthy prevent it.

"Where are the ladies?" he demands. "Here, doctor," and they make a brave showing, seated upon the trunk near by.

"Are you hurt?" he asks, anxiously, approaching them, but his words are meant for Avis only.

"No, sir, but a little alarmed—it came so suddenly, you see," replies the girl.

"Well, we must not miss that train. In a pinch, my vehicle will hold us all. Let us get the trunk up quickly, Larry. Not a minute to waste."

Jack's driver professes to be horrified at the prospect of the ladies with risk even his neck for such royal pay, and then he takes up the ladies placed inside, and Larry squeezes among them. Jack is about to climb on top among the trunks, but they will not hear of it—the ladies insist, and he is obliged to help them to do so he is compelled to have the proud New York girl sit upon his lap.

Strange things then often occur to travellers on the Continent, and Avis laughs heartily at the situation, while they look along, lurching this way and that, sometimes threatening to topple over. The blushing beauty has a twinkle in it, for do you know, the city fellow is chuckling to himself at the thought of how this ludicrous situation would strike the eye of Mercedes' cousin, but she is too busy to speak, until the vehicle drives up to the station.

Then he finds they are in ample time for the train. He takes it upon himself to buy four first-class tickets for Paris, looks after the luggage, and does not least secure a compartment to themselves. Such is the magic power of money on the Continent—the train is there, and he is over the civilized world.

They are all feeling particularly joyful over the success of their game. No one but Jack is aware of the fact that the paasha knows their hurried departure from Madrid.

Doctor Jack walks up and down outside the platform, under the pressure of the ordinary Spanish train which ladies have given him the privilege of being in the train. Jack's eyes are turned to the paasha as he stands by the door, and he is looking at him with a certain interest.
