REMEMBRANCE.

I think of thee
When the soft voice of the nightingales,
sweet and plaintive warblings to the night, I think of thee,
By the cool Waters of the Shaded fountain;
ile, in the shimmering rays of twidight glow,
Glisten the mountains.
Where thinkest thou of me?

I think of thee, tender hopes and anxious fears, ings for the one I love, And burning tears, How thinkest thou of me I think of thee.
Until we meet again some happier
then, however distantly my feet i Still shall I think and pray
Only of thee!

The last report about Millie Christina, the two-headed nightingale, in Paris, is that she is on the point or marriage, the Murat Halstead says that Americans abroad this year are not innumerable, but it must be admitted they are abundant. The energy with which they consume time and the rapidity with which they cover space are sources of much astonishment in the "effete monarchies." It is commonly remarked that the Americans are coming to know more about Europe than the Europeans themselver. They not only know more about the French than the English, but they become more familiar with the historic persons and famous scenes of either country than the great mass of its own inhabitants.

Change the 'copy' of his contributors was discussed.

"Thackeray maintained that no such right existed, except as regarded errors of grammar, and declared that the only person who could make alterations for the better was the author himself; as a rule, editorial changes were blunders. I told an editor so once and he did not like it. 'I have no objection to your putting your hoofs on my paragraphs,' I remarked, 'but I decidedly object to your sticking your ears through them.' He never forgave you, of course.' 'He never forgave you hose on my paragraphs,' I never thought to ask.' Thackeray and Jerrold used to sit near each other at the Punch dinners, and Jerrold was inclined to wrangle if everything was not to his liking; but Thackeray would keep the peace. This advertisement is published in the Fort Collins (Col.) Sentinel: "Wanted, about fifty unmarried ladies, between the ages of eighteen and forty, sound of limb, wind and bustle, by fifty uxorious bachelors and widowers of this city. Husbands and homes guaranteed. No crusaders need apply."

The Missouri Caucasian indulges in the following journalistic amenity: "Old Peterson, of the Brownsville (Saline county) patent outside Banner, has joined the Third-party movement in his county. He has drifted to his affinity. He is himself only one-third of a cypher. Poor old flea-bitten, skinny-bony, whose knee and arm joints have been held together for twenty years with cotton twine—a delightful wretch, he, to talk about corruption in the Democratic party. Nobody would own this tapewormy and dyspeptic creature, and feed him for his work. No other than a millionaire could afford it."

We turged the dreaded corner at last, when to my astonishment, Mr. Thackeray held straight past the hideous figure, turning his head neither to the right nor left, and chatting as airily as though we were strolling through an English park. Now I know that the mstant we came in sight of poor Jackson's carricature he saw it, realized its accumulated terrors at a glance, and in the charity of his great heart took all pains to avoid having a word said about it.
