HIS LORDSHIP'S ROMANCE

CHAPTER VII.

The ball room at Lynnewolde was a magnificent apartment. Nothing could be in better taste than the decorations. be in better taste than the decorations. The scene was picturesque and dazzling; the innumerable light, the rich hangings, the costly and fragrant flowers, the exquisite dresses of the ladies, the gleaming of rich jewels. Faint, exquisite perfumes seemed to steal upon the air, the music was of the best, and the whole scene one of animation and enjoyment.

If Lord Lynne could have consulted

if Lord Lynne could have consulted his own inclination, he would have open-ed the ball with Agatha; but the Coun-tess of Strathdale and her daughter, of Strathcase and her daughter, Victoria, were present, and stern ette pointed to the tall, plain swoman, and Philip could not but

"Keep the first waltz for me, Agatha,"

he whispered.
"I have just promised Allan," she re-plied. "I am so sorry. Ask Inez; she likes waltzing."

And again as Lord Lynne drew near his cousin, he was struck with her astonishing beauty. Inez had arrayed herself or conquest that evening. "He loves magnificence," she said to herself "and my dress shall please, him;" and please him it did, for his eyes rested upon her as they would have done on some rare picture. Her dress was of some glowing, soft material, mingled white and gold. A coronet of superbopals, the last gift of her father, shone in the midst of her wealth of hair; opals were clasped round the firm white throat and the exquisite arms, and a deep crimson rose, artistically placed in the bodice of her dress, gave sufficient color to relieve the white. The brilliant, passionate face was radiant in its beauty; the dark eyes flashed as they had never done before, for she had hoped at last—this haughty girl who spurned alike love and lovers—that Lord Lynne loved her. She had no reason for it, save that his eyes, had softened when he had gazed upon her, and his lips had touched her hand; he was coming, too, to ask her for the waltz, the dreamy, delicious muste of which had just begun. If she had known he sought her in compliance with Agatha's request, she would not have smiled assent. She would have trampled upon her own heart rather than have owed one act of kindness from him to another.

Ignorance is sometimes happiness, and Inez was really happy as she moved in unison with that music. She was, as are all Spanish ladies, a graceful dancer. No haste or awkwardness—easy, and with graceful dignity, she seemed to make the music and the motion one Lord Lynne had never danced with her before; it was her unusual superiority that made him say, "That was the best waltz I ever had in my life. If I were a lord of the marble for large for love of him, was waltz I ever had in my life. If I were a lord of the marble for large for And again as Lord Lynne drew near his cousin, he was struck with her asher wild, southern nature, loved him, and walked down the room by his side as one in a dream, Lord Lynne was saying to himself, "Now, I will seek my darling to-night, I will ask her to be my wife."

Agatha enjoyed the dancing; Allan kept as much as possible to her side. No one who saw him could doubt that he loved this gentle girl, who smiled so kindly upon him.

The music of another waitz sounded more enchanting, more delicious, than the first, and again Lord Lynne sought linez.

Once more to this wild, dreamy music she seemed to float as through the air, with the face she loved best on earth smiling upon her. Then when he released her, her heart was full of happiness. She could not remain there to laugh and talk; she did not wish to hear the sound of another voice while his lingered upon her ear. She wanted to badone for a few minutes—alone with her happiness and her love.

She passed rapidly through the ball-room, and into the conservatory. It was dimly lighted; the air, loaded with luscious perfume, made her dizzy with its excess of fragrance. Out upon the lawn she saw the silvery moonlight and the shadow of the trees upon the same of the trees upon the sines? raged within her.

It was a war; for there were times to the dark masses of wood, the shining lake, the picturesque gardens; they bathed all in their sweet, who has been ill for several weeks, is who has been ill for kelvin, the famous scientist, who has been ill for several weeks, is cottled. Never did "good and evil" right for a human heart as they struggled that high the face she love of large the cannot recover.

A Suitable and Serviceable.

Xmas present. A cardigan jacket, sweater, etc. Our line of Christmas thould be hers; and she was not of those who esteem an oath as a "light burden," to be thrown off at will.

She now sat by the window of her should, ers. She was almost terriby beautiful to behold as that "war of passed rapidly through the ball-room, and into the conservatory. It was dimly lighted; the air, loaded with luscious perfume, made her dizzy with its excess of fragrance. Out upon the lawn she saw the silvery moonlight and the shadow of the trees upon the lawn she saw the silvery moonlight and the shadow of the trees upon the la grass. Out in the moonlight the lilies and roses slept, the night dew lying thick upon them.

The cool, soft light looked tempting lonencugh after the heated room. Inez longed to be out in it, to dream for a few minutes, among the sleeping flowers, of her happiness and her love. She drew her white shawl over her head and passed out on to the lawn. The stillness of the night was soothing after the gay music and laughter. She sat down under the great cedar; and while she lived, Inez Lynne never forgot the solemn beauty of that scene. In the distance she heard the faint sount of the dance-music—the moonlight, the trees, the sighing of the breeze, the perfume of the flowers, all told one story to the impassioned girl—the story of her happiness and her love.

Beautiful as it was, she did not remain long. She was engaged for the third waltz to Lord Lynne, and she did not wish to lose that. She went back quietly and gently into the conservatory. Her light footsteps made no noise.

"I might be a ghost, I glide so well," she said to herself, with a smile. But the smile died upon her lips; for, standing by the side of the marble Flora was Lord Lynne and her sister Agatha. They neither saw nor heard her, and she stood rooted to the spot, unable to move, unable, if her life had depended upon it, to utter one word.

In his hand Lord Lynne held a beau.

with graceful dignity, she seemed to make the music and the motion one. Lord Lynne had never danced with her before; it was her unusual superiority that made him say, "That was the best waltz I ever had in my life. If I were a Spanish courtier, I should say that every day develops new gifts and graces in my charming cousin."

It was simply a pretty complimentary speech, such as Lord Lynne had often whispered to his partner. There was nothing in it to cause her heart to thrill and tremble, and her cheeks to glow. It is pitful to think how people can help to delude themselves. While she with the whole force and strength of her wild, southern nature, loved him, and walked down the room by his side so me in a dream, Lord Lynne was a pitful sight upon which the love and happiness frozen and can be considered the seement to make her own. She stood quite still among the dark green shrubs, and no sound told of the deadly strife and despair, no word told the deadly strife and despair, no word told the love and happiness frozen and dead. Her stender jewelled fliggers were tightly clenched, but she stood silent land motionless as a statue, until Lord Lynne went away; then, with light, noiseless step, she fled to her own room, and rapidly closed and locked the door.

It was a pitful sight upon which the door.

It was a pitiful sight upon which the moonbeams fell. The proud, beautiful girl, radiant with love and happiness so short a time since, with a great cry, flung herself down, and the moonlight fell upon the gleaming opals, the sumptions dress, and the white, despairing face.

Then Bertie Bohun, half timidly came to beg for one dance. He was dazzled by the brightness of the face that smidel upon him."

"You are very kind," he said, as he led her to her place in the quardille, "to dance with me."

She looked at him in amazement as she repeated, "Kind—what do you mean?"

"If I were a king with a crown, or a general covered with orders and medals, or a duke with the garden fand the ribbon of St. George," he said awkwardly, "I should feel more at my case, and more worthy of dancing with you."

It was a boyish speech, but it came from the depths of an honest, boyish heart. He might be young and awkward, but he loved this beautiful girl with the whole strength of his simple, candid nature.

Inez laughed merrily at his florid compliments, a delicious, silvery, rippling laugh; but it tingled his cheeks with shame as he heard it.

"Ah, you are laughing at me," he said, trying to conceal his mortification." 'I thought you would laugh if you ever knew I dared to presume to admire you."

"I ought to be very much obliged to you," she said, the smile lingering on her lips and in her eyes.

"Do not laugh at me again, Miss Lynne," said noor Restie. "If you are cheeks, were flushed with the most extensed her the most extensed her her said that she had never known a sigh or shed a tear. The onals gleamed in her dryk hair, her cheeks were flushed with the most extensed.

had never known a sigh or shed a tear. The opals gleamed in her dark hair, her cheeks were flushed with the most exclusive color, and her eyes were bright tain any recollection of my folly, will you also remember that my life is at your service; and if ever the time should come in which you require a friend with a strong will and a brave heart, will you remember me?"

She smiled again, but in after years those words came back to her.

It was a brilliant party assembled that evening at Lynnewolde. The belief of the room was undoubtedly the beautiful, dark-eyed Andalusian. The gentlemen raved about her; the ladies were not jealous of her—she was too unlike them. Had she been more commonplace, she might have stirred their envy; as it was, all smaller feelings were merged in surprise. She seemed careless of the homage so frely offered her. Inez had but one thought, one idea, one hope, and that was to win the love of the man she loved.

when a softer look came to the exquisite face, and softer tears fell down the pale cheeks. Then a better and nobler impulse whispered to her to be patient, to submit, to leave her sister happy in her love, to conquer and trample upon the wild love that "wrought havoe" within. But the better impulse passed, and the proud, indomitable spirit woke up lieteer and stronger for its repulse. "No mercy has ever been shown to me!" she murmured. "Years and years ago, if I had had the love that ought to have been mine—if my father had treated me as he did his other child—my life would have been different. Shall I lose the only love I ever asked for, the only blessing life has to give me? I cannot!"

So she watched and repeated wild words to herself, until the first faint dawn of the morning came into the sky. A thought had struck her; in the first few minutes that it came to her, she seemed to shrink from it, for a crimson flush covered her face, and her eyes fell as though with a sense of shame. Yet it came again, and again she played with it. She let herself think of all that might be, and then she yielded, and said it should be so.

"What to kill and not to kill" would be an appropriate title for the fortheroming work on useful and harmful creeping creawing and jumping live things that bother the farmer. The production as the collorado beetle; of the truncated snapping bettle, that voracious devourer of potatoes, turnips, cabbages, beets, arrots, onions and, other produce, and fermer in helping to rid him to the temps that bother the farmer. The production and p ment that will be spread over the country for the benefit of all farmers and scientists.

The despised toad will be given a new lease of life when the report is read, and many snakes that have heretofore been allowed to masquerade as harmless because they are non-poisonous will hear their 'death warrant read for the sole but all-sufficient reason that they regard a frog or toad as the geratest dainty on the reptilian bill of fare. Snakes who kill toads are marked down as no friend of the efarmer, because they destroy the useful toad that lives on the insect pests that destroy the crops and vegetables. The bugs and caterpillars prey on the produce of the farm, the frogs and toads prey on the bugs and caterpillars prey on the frogs and toads. Therefore, it is logical for the farmer to go gunning for the snakes who swallow his little hopping friends, and to enable him to do this with discretion the economic zoologist will specify those snakes that have been found to live on frogs and toads and will state exactly the kind of insectivorous pests that were found in the stomach of the friendly hoppers.

There will be a fund of good advice in the ferhooming bulletin concerning the
