to how Premier Lloyd George would neet President Wilson's latest deollowers for the abandonment of he based on disapproval of the general war policy and especially the enement of the functions of the Sueme Council. The Commens was not disappointed for the sitting proved unusually exciting. It could hardbe said that Asquith rose to exctation of most of his party, but Perhaps the most notable thing was the contrast in speeches of the Premler and former Premier with reference to Wilson's speech. While Asquith endorsed fully the President's view Lloyd George did not even mention Wilson's last speech and declined to see in Count Czernin's state any nearer approach to reasonable terms than in Count Von Hertling's.

Moreover the Chancellor's demands that Great Britain give up her coaling stations proved fully that the controllers of the German policy were in no mood to discuss reasonable terms of peace. The Premier declared absoutely that he would not yield on the matter of revealing more about the Versailles conference, and challenged the House if dissatisfied with the Government's conduct of the war to but another government in 'ts place. The question of enlarging the status of the Versailles Council led to a little scene between the Premier and Asquith, and throughout his remarks about the Council the Premier was subjected to a running fire of heckling, punctuated with 4oud cheers from the extreme Liberals, many of whom, in subsequent speeches, made strong attacks on the Premier regarding his allied connection with the press. Lord Hugh Cecil, member for Oxford University, admitted that the Premier's speech was reassuring, but said that the weakness of the Govrnment lay in the existence of coinidences between utterancs in the press and certain lines of Governmental action. He supposed the government would not hesitate to suppress if necessary, even the most inuential journals acting contrary to the national interest. Admiral Sir Hedworth Meux invited the Premier to get rid of his private secretaries and also the press which was hanging around his neck like an albatross. While the Versailles Conference was under discussion the Premier was also met by constant cries of "don't lvulge," at one point Andrew Bonar Law, Chancellor of the Exchequer, in rposing to deny that Field Marshal aig or General Robertson had been sed or resigned, and being
