LORD MORDEN'S DAUGHTER

— OR —

THE TRAGEDY OF THE CEDARS.

CHAPTER XXXI.

"I don't believe it," pursued the valet. "It is false; I can prove it! By Heaven! and that smiling villain is with you! Master, I beg of you to listen to me!"

"This comes of making a confidant of one's servant," Melville said, plaintively. "Really, there can be but one master."

"Peters, you can say all that you wish to say to me at home," Locksley replied, reprovingly. "You are standing in my light if you make matters awkward now, and you do not wish to do that, I know."

Peters relinquished his hold on the horse's reins, and met the malevolent glance of the viscount with a savage, threatening glare.

"I believe that he has lied to you, master," he said. "And I shall not follow you to 'The Cedars.' I have important work here!"

"Drive on," the viscount called to his cabman.

"One moment," growled the valet, and he thrust his face close to that of the schemer. "You will not injure him! You will not injure him! You will not hurt a single hair of his head! His well-being alone is your safeguard."

"You are mad!" said Melville, with a ghastly smile.

"I repeat what I have said," was the ominous rejoinder. "I have much to do here at present, but I will come later to see how my foolish master fares at your hands, and I will come well supported."

"I will not suffer this," was the hoarse cry of the viscount.

He tried to signal to the driver to go on, but the valet laid upon his wrist a grasp of steel.

"One moment," he laughed. "I wish you to understand me and obey. I do not think you will dare to disobey me. If you do, I will ask you what has become of Sir George Moncrieff? Good-night, master. You are safe for a time at least!"

As the horse plunged away into the darkness, Melville heard his mocking laughter; it rang in his ears like the gloating of a demon.

Ten minutes earlier he had had visions of wealth and ease, but they were changed, and the noose of the hangman's rope dangled before his eyes.

"For a time," he thought. "I am balked, for a short time."

He showed his teeth, through his parted lips, and they were set in a firm line.

"This valet saw the affair by the horse-pond! He alone is in my path now. The man beside me is a cipher comparatively."

He smiled, and muttered: "For a short time!"

CHAPTER XXXII.

Dora had approached "The Cedars," a pale, trembling anxious girl; she left the house of mystery a determined woman.

Frank Rogers was waiting for her at Charing Cross station, and he marvelled at the change that marked her features.

He had news of importance, but he refrained from speaking until Dora made some sign.

"I am glad that you are here, Mr. Rogers," she said, "and I want you to take me to the office of Mr. Fairfax, the barrister, at once."

"You have no news of Mr. Locksley?" he asked. "I would suggest, madam," he added, after a moment's hesitation, "that you confide in me. I have all Mr. Locksley's private affairs in hand, even in preference to Mr. Fairfax."

"I shall intrust everything to you," Dora replied. "I desire to consult Mr. Fairfax upon the question of the validity of my marriage—to inform him of my true position, and then we will move Heaven itself to search for my husband."

Frank hailed a cab, and in ten minutes Dora found herself in the presence of the young barrister.

He met her eyes gravely—questioningly.

"I cannot understand where Mr. Locksley can have gone to," he said. "I am astonished that he has not communicated with me—that he has not carried out arrangements that we made."

He hesitated to speak outright, and paced the floor in great agitation.

"I have heard to-day," Dora faltered, "that my marriage was no marriage at all. Will you tell me my exact position?"

"It was this suggestion, Mrs. Locksley, that took Edmund away from you on your wedding day. My sudden illness was a little fiction of mine. The marriage holds good until set aside by a judge in chancery. It may be that you would get the decision, but the position is a painful one, and it was decided that the ceremony should be performed again on the following day, at Streamham, with an ordinary license. Edmund left me in good spirits with this arrangement in view, to see his father, and I have heard not one word of him since."

Dora then related her interview with Viscount Melville, and Fairfax vented his rage and indignation in no measured terms.

"There is a foul plot—a base conspiracy afoot," he said, "and it is in some way connected with the elder Locksley's secluded life. My dear Mrs. Locksley, do not anticipate that Edmund is seriously hurt or anything of that kind. Remember that we are living in the nineteenth century—in the days of police, and the electric light and my friend is no child to be made away with."

"I am glad," she murmured tearfully, "that I may call myself by the name he gave me—for a time, at least. I will visit you again to-morrow, Mr. Fairfax, and in the meantime I shall not be idle."

She could see that he was aroused to action, and felt grateful to him for his kind sympathy.

She accompanied Frank Rogers to a cafe, where he chose a quiet corner. He ordered tea a Dora's request, and then reported upon the work he had in hand.

"As it is of vital importance to you, Mrs. Locksley, I should like your approval, and must prepare you for surprises," he told her. "I cabled advertisements to a number of colonial newspapers, and, on my own responsibility offered a substantial reward for information concerning Lord Alfred Morden, who is supposed to have died in India seventeen years since. I signed these notices with one word only—Dora. I have already received a cable from a detective in Africa. Here it is."

Dora took the slip of paper and read: "Met Lord Morden five years since, travelling incog. Send particulars. Following this was the address of the police headquarters of a colonial city."

It was hard for Dora to control her agitation, and she trembled from head to foot.

"Oh, Mr. Rogers," she exclaimed, "there is hope—there is hope!"

"There is more than that, Mrs. Locksley," returned Frank, pale with excitement. "To my thinking there is absolute certainty that your father, Lord Alfred Morden, is in the land of the living, and that if we can only bring our advertisement under his eye, we shall have him claiming you before long. Now all I want is your permission to advertise in the chief London dailies, to advertise in a way that will appeal to his lordship's heart if he has one."

"If you think that my husband would approve, I have nothing to say," Dora told him; "but this is of a secondary consideration, even the finding of my father, until Edmund comes back to me."

She gave way for a little while, and wept bitterly, while Frank turned away, alligently engaged with pencil and paper.

"I will put this advertisement in the papers, Mrs. Locksley," he said, at length; "it will not occupy an hour, and while we are waiting for results, every moment shall be engaged in searching for Mr. Locksley. You have no reason to fear anything worse than an accident. Big strong men are not spirited away, in these times."

He spoke cheerfully, but his heart misgave him.

Mrs. Hill: "Does your husband object to cats?"
 Mrs. Hill: "Yes, indeed. He says I feed all his cats in the neighbourhood. Won't you stay and have tea?"

NERVES AND FAINTING SPELLS

Sent Woman to Bed. Great Change After Taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Sarnia, Ontario.—"After my girl was born I was a wreck. My nerves were too terrible for words and I simply could not stand or walk without pain. I suffered with fainting spells until I was no longer any good for my household duties and had to take to my bed. The doctor said I should have an operation, but I was not in a fit condition at that time. My neighbor said, 'Why don't you try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound?' I am sure it will do you good and will save those doctor's bills." So I was advised by my husband to try it after I told him about it. I am very thankful to say that I was soon able to take a few boarders for a while as rooms were scarce at that time. My baby is 17 months old now and I have not yet had an operation, thanks to your medicine. I have recommended the Vegetable Compound to a few people I know and have told them the good it has done me. I know I feel and look a different woman these last few months and I certainly would not be without a bottle of your medicine in the house. You can use this letter as you see fit, as I should be only too glad for those suffering as I have to know what it has done for me."—Mrs. ROBERT G. MACDONALD, R. R. No. 2, Sarnia, Ontario.

A recent canvass of women users of the Vegetable Compound report 98 out of 100 received beneficial results. C

Italy's Action Against Communists

2 TONS OF LITERATURE SEIZED.

ROME.—Alarmed at the outbursts of criminal Communist activity in Europe, the Italian police are keeping a special watch on Italian Communist circles.

Searches of suspected houses have been carried out in many localities and many arrests and detentions have been made, especially in Naples, where the police took more than a hundred persons in charge.

In Rome the authorities have seized about two tons of propagandist literature packed, addressed, and loaded in motor-torries ready for distribution.

The Italian police believe they have unearthed a Communist insurance plot to embrace the whole of Europe. The plot is operated by the Moscow Cheka, which sent out instructions for the organization of the proletariat in Central Europe, the Balkans, and Italy.—Exchange.

18,000 Pounds Cheaper

FOREIGN SHIPBUILDING TENDERS AND BRITISH.

Tenders which the Blue Star Line invited recently for eight refrigerated meat ships have now been received and are being considered.

These ships are to be each of about 12,000 tons dead weight, and the Shipbuilding and Shipping Record understands that the lowest Continental price is from £18,000 to £20,000 per steamer lower than the lowest British tender.

Efforts are being made to bridge the difference with a view to retaining the contracts in this country.

"If you think that my husband would approve, I have nothing to say," Dora told him; "but this is of a secondary consideration, even the finding of my father, until Edmund comes back to me."
