ANNABEL

OR—
THE TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XXII.

IMPORTANT ISSUES.

"You cannot but know the fate that awaits you?"
 "I can guess it."
 "And still you refuse to speak?"
 "Why should I speak?" he savagely asked. "It wouldn't make any difference I know."
 "Perhaps it would. Your doom as a murderer is before you sure and certain, but there is such a thing as torture before it, which you may escape if you answer my questions."
 "Torture away. I won't answer," was the defiant response.
 "Gentlemen, I think I can answer for him," said Philip, stepping forward at this juncture. "I too, am an Englishman. I came to America for the express purpose of seeing Jerry. Just, and I am fully persuaded that this man was sent to prevent me from seeing him—sent by one whose interest it was to hinder me from receiving information on a certain matter which could be given by no one on earth but Jerry. Is this not the truth?" he asked, addressing Lorton, who lay swooning up at him. "Are you not the hired agent of Bernard Hayes, commissioned by him to prevent me from learning from Jerry just where the marriage of Annabel Leighton's parents took place?"
 A look of fiendish malignance gathered on Lorton's brutal face, as withering with in his bonds he drew himself together, and hissed out.
 "Yes, and I have done it."
 "You have; but can you triumph in the deed, when you know that your own life is the penalty?"
 "I ran the risk, and Sam Lorton ain't the man to show the white feather. I've baffled you, and that was all I cared for."
 He had hardly uttered these words of reckless bravado, when a loud exclamation came from one of the women who were bending over Jerry and washing away the blood from his gaping wound.
 "He lives—he still lives!" she wildly cried, and her words caused every one to rush across the room to the spot.
 It was no delusion on the woman's part for the bare bosom could plainly be seen heaving up and down, and even as they gazed the heaving became more obvious till they grew actually violent, and a stream of blood gushed from Jerry's mouth.
 As the same instant he slowly opened his eyes, and gazed at them in consciousness.
 "Water," he murmured, in a low but perfectly audible tone.
 They raised him up, and another stream of blood flowed forth. When it subsided, they laid a vessel to his lips: he drank greedily and was revived.
 But they were not deceived; all saw that he was dying, and evidently he knew it himself, for he smiled sadly as he looked from one to another and whispered—
 "Is all safe now?"
 "Yes, Jerry," answered Stephen Bolton. "The Indians have fled, and no one is badly hurt but yourself."
 "I'm glad of that," said Jerry. "I shall die happy."
 "Please God you may recover," said the other, in a husky voice.
 "No, Stephen, no; my time is come. I'm going—fast. Good-bye."
 Philip grasped Stevie's arm convulsively, and looked the wish he had not power to speak. The trapper understood him, and stepped forward till he stood where Jerry could see him.
 The dying man's eye lighted on his face, and his gaze was fixed.
 "Jerry, don't you know me—your old friend, Stevie Redhank?"
 Jerry tried to hold out his hand, but was too weak. He smiled recognition, and a gleam of joy kindled in his fading eyes.
 Stevie took Jerry's hand tenderly in both his own, and the two looked lovingly into each other's face. Doubtless a recollection of happy days in the long past came into both their hearts.
 "Farewell, Stevie; I'm going," murmured Jerry. "Who was he—the man who—who?"
 "The mean cuss who gave you that wound?" said Stevie, in a tone of wrath. "He's a vagabond Britisher—a hired scoundrel, who was sent out by a villain even worse than himself to keep this youth from seeing you. See yonder, the wretch lying bound, ready to be hanged, and here is the young gentleman, Mister Weston, who has come so far to see you."
 Jerry's fading vision wandered first to the scowling visage of Sam Lorton, then sought the face of Philip, who stood close to him in trembling eagerness.
 "To see me?" said Jerry, faintly, regarding the youth with wonder and recognition.
 "Yes, Jerry," said Philip, speaking very hastily, for he dreaded that weakness or unconsciousness would overtake the dying man ere the all important information was given. "I came from England for the one object of seeing you to get information about a marriage which no one on but you can give—the marriage of Everard Leighton and Annabel Seymour."
 "Everard Leighton?" murmured Jerry, and his face assumed a far-drawn look.
 "Yes, you were his friend, were you not? It was a private marriage, for her brother was against it."
 "I know—I remember. Poor Everard. He and I were as brothers. I heard he was dead."
 "Long ago, and his wife too. But the marriage—where was it celebrated? for that cannot be discovered, and it is of the utmost importance to their daughter—their only child—to know. Oh, Jerry, tell me the name of the place?"
 "Yes—yes—I remember it well. I and the church warden were the only witnesses."
 "And the place—the place?" gasped Philip.
