The Egyptian Climate.

While the circumstances of the Egyptian climate are in general reassuring there are in mortant differences between various parts of the country and between various parts of the country and between various seasons of the vear. The prevailing westerly winds in the damp season goes around to the east, and for the civity and the heat of the body, as he former causes a metamorphosis and raste of tissue and the latter always ids decomposition. The fact is one of common observation. It is well illustrated in the quickened breathing fa tired animal, and in the almost mitre suspension of respiration in the internating state. The respiration in the internating state. The respiration of a cold-blooded creature is increased by attificial beat. In extremely hot weather frogs may have to leave the water entirely and fishes come to the surface to procure air. Reversely, frogs can be kept for years in a state of asspended animation by a low temperature and revived by warming. Some low animals can survive freezing or drying for an indefinite time, and, under such circumstances, the waste of the tissues must be entirely suspended.—Popular Science Monthly.
