True love has its usual unpleasant course in the bosom of a woman in the upper part of Evansville, Ind., who loved not wisely but too well. Her lover presented her with a late style of false teeth to replace those missing from between the lips where his vere wont to stray and steal the dew of love. But coldness finally came, and he sought another object for his affections. She, too, happened to be toothless, and the lover had recourse to her whom he had descreted, and the teeth were wrested from her and presented to the new love. The banks of the river were rugged, high, and rocky; the stream itself—a brawling, tumultous thread of water—was harely visible from their height.

A bold idea entered Alice's mind. It was a womanly idea; to a man it would have seemed impracticable. She put her can be added to the holster of her saddle to feel that her toy-like pistols were safe. How thankful she was that she had complied with Tom's request and carried these weapons!

Then he seemed almost to stretch out in a straight black line. His fore feet struck the edge of the other bank. Down came the whip. He gathered himself up. Horse and rider had leaped the river.

The astonished Comanches turned and viewed the apparition with astonishment. Alice levelled her pistol at the nearest Indian and fired. He reeled in his seat, and then fell to the ground. Alice dropped her whip and seized the bridle of Guy Philips' horse. She heard him mutter her name.

The frightened animals were headed towards the river. She used the butt of her pistol to urge them on. It seemed as if her brave spirit awed the horses into obedience. With a bound, which seemed as if it would crack their sinews, they cleared the gulf.

The Comanche attempted to follow, but his horse refused the leap. Infuriated, the Indian goaded the animal to it. The horse barely touched the hank with his front hoofs, struggling to gain it for an instant, and then horse and rider sank down into the channel beneath.

According to the Herald of Realth marble tables are to be avoided. It says:

"They are cold, and rapidly absorb the heat and vitality of the body, robbing it of the life. We have heard of one invalid whom the doctor could not cure, until one day he noticed she used a marble stand, of the Newst Styles and most Economic theories, struggling to gain it for an instant, and then horse and rider sank down into the channel beneath.

'I say, Alice,' laughed Tom, 'You have fairly asserted woman's right—to use a pistol.'

'I will continue to assert woman's right to help man,' returned Alice, glancing fondly at Guy.

The culture of tobacco may now be looked upon as one of the principal pursuits of Algeria. The tobacco crops of 1874 have been exceedingly abundant, and the returns are double those of the previous year namely, 3,520,907 francs. Since the year 1817, it has been calculated that the cultivation of tobacco has realized 54,006,-000 francs.

FEEDING UP FOR WINTER.

There are two critical periods through which farm stock is called to pass, vis:
when grass gets short and frost bitten in the fall, and again when winter begins to let go his hold, and spring approaches. Digestion suffers after the frost bites the grass, because it becomes innutritious, and stock becoming more hungry as cold advances, they eat greedily of it. It ferments in the stome and, produces flatulence, a staring coat, and sensitiveness to the cold. No animal can stand cold and wet, whose digestion is impaired. In such a condition, the stomach and bowels become irritable, the blood rushing to them from the surface producing chilliness, even though the weather be not cold. From the moment that this condition sets in the animal begins to stack from the absorption of such flesh as had been accumulated in summer and early fall. These form the principal reasons why approaching winter is a critical period. To avert these tendencies, farmeres should provide a patch of blue grass, according to the amount of stock kept, and turn the stock on this for a portion of the day, when other grass begins to fail. This, holding its vitality well into winter, even in the morth-west, provides against the sudden change, and consequent strain upon the digestion, otherwise sure to follow. Farmers during the entire season with marked by the absence of good grass.

As stated, approaching spring is the trying period for all stock that has undergone exposure during winter. The appetite fails, because the stomach tires of the homely fare, damaged by exposure during the winter, for which some degree of relish had been maintained through exposure to a bracing, dry at mosphere. Farm stock, if it receives the care to which it is entitled, will from the lst of March to grass, be housed and fed at night and in stormy done. Free Press.

Stock so kept will shed of early, and give a good account of itself during the season. If these precau-tions are not observed, it will ordinarily take the months of May and June, on good pasture, to put the stock in the condition it should be in on the first of May.—W. Farm Journal.

SEED POTATOES. Farmers should have an eye to their he remarked :-Farmers should have an eye to their seed potatoes for planting this spring. The experience of thousands of farmers in various sections of the country goes to show that large potatoes for seed are no better than medium sized ones, only that in a dry season, if planted whole, they sustain the plants by the moisture in them better than small potatoes. It is not advisable to plant the small ones; they should be fed on, but select those for seed that are rather too small for marketing. But in a rich soil, and in a sufficiently moist season, potatoes no larger than walnuts will produce good sight." STORE!

winter, even in the north-west, provides against the sudden change, and consequent strain upon the digestion, otherwise sure to follow. Farmers would do well to place light rations of bright hay within the reach of stock, as early as the appearance of the first frosts. A small amount of this, they will find, will be eaten with avidity and and evident relish, and much will be added to the ability of the animal to battle with the coming cold and exposure, by replacing the want of succulent grass, and prepairing the diges tive organs for the steady use of dry fodder and hay during winter.

There is no period when grain can be given with greater profit than during November and December, because it is of the utmost importance to retain what of flesh and vigor has been laid up during the grazing season, by generous feeding and shelter, preparatory to entering the last half of winter. This is always the trying half for such beasts as are not housed and regularly fed during the entire season with marked by the absence of good grass.
