restrict when one starts out to find one for five or six dollars.

A beautiful little tea table in the style of Louis XV, of which the sketch on this page gives a very good idea, has the top in onyx and the rest of the table in gilt. This would My stock of dress goods is not so large a and the rest of the table in gilt. This would necessarily be very expensive, and only appreciated for a certain style of room, but the same design might be used in mahagany or cherry, or any other kind of wood that might be preferred. The use of such little tables, when the style is really good, is invaluable in helping out the decoration of a room; they break the monotony of an otherwise stiff looking room and form centers around which people naturally group them; such such as the around which people naturally group them-selves. A pretty leaf or bit of drapery is of course an improvement to almost every table. Some very handsome tables or stands are made by the Japanese of teakwood with marble tops. In design they are straight and square, the legs beautifully carved; the only objection is they are very heavy looking and odistinctly Japanese that they would be out of place in a room that did not in some way suggest the Japanese style in decoration. Some of these tables sell as low as $6, and, considering their workmanship, seem very cheap.

A very inexpensive little table might be made for a library or sitting room of almost any wood one might fancy, and it might almost serve for a bookcase, as it has ample room for books or papers. In construction it is something like a very high office stool, except that the top and shelves are square and it has four legs instead of three. At about a foot from the top a second shelf is placed, and this is followed by three or four shelves the same shape as the top; of course the natural spread shape as the top; of course the natural spread of the legs would make the bottom shelf con-siderably larger than the first, and these

AN INEXPENSIVE TABLE. shelves are not only very odd and pretty, but are also very useful, with a few bits of pretty china on the top and the rest of the shelves used for books and papers; this makes a nice little tea table for a library or general sitting room, and almost any carpenter could make one.

Many fanciful ideas are carried out in the Many fanciful ideas are carried out in the way of tables now—some heart shaped, some called kidney shaped and others where both the heart and kidney shapes are combined, the one for the upper, the other for the lower shelf. They could hardly be called tea tables, but, as they are small, they make a nice resting place for brica-brac and are very appropriate for small rooms.

In the dining room of a prominent New York artist is a dining table that might be used with good effect in many houses, and the expense of making such a table could, if one were handy, be said to be literally nothing, and the result, if only half as good as the original, would still be a very unique and artistic thing in the way of tables.

In the first place a pair of ordinary wooden horses had been taken, painted white, then rubbed down to a fine enameled surface; upon these horses was placed a large piece of rubbed down to a fine enameled surface; upon these horses was placed a large piece of square wood, very much like an enlarged drawing board, which had been previously treated in the same manner as the horses. This board was then fastened to the horses by means of large brass headed nails. Of course the only part of this table which would be at all difficult to make would be the enameling, as it generally takes from five to six coats of paint before it is rubbed down with pumicestone and oil. It might be made on the same plan, stained black and then finon the same plan, stained black and then fin-ished with the brass headed nails. This would be very much easier to construct, and would not require even the aid of a carpenter.
