The Ledger, a paper published in Philadelphia, states it at a woman residing in Little Water Street, died last week of starvation. This horrible fact is rendered not a little extraordinary, from its baving occurred in the mists of the populous and wealty city of Philadelphia. It appears that her husband was a habitual drunkard, and the supplies obtained from him were inadequate to the sustenance of herself and five children. This unhappy woman very naturally denied herself that food which might sustain her children, but, she very unaccountably screened her decadful situation from her neighbours, fearfluid exposing the extent of her husband's depravity.
