A Cabinet Secret.

From All the Year Round.

I made Rebert Headley's acquaint ance in the auction room. I am an idle man, and, having plenty of time and occasionally a few pounds to spare, have gradually contracted a love for brica-brac, the pursuit of which enables me to kill a good many weary heurs, and to hoard up in the shape eld china, money which otherwise, would be frittered away on equally useless but less valuable objects.

I asked him where, and he told me it belonged to a lady living at Shepter to the tapot, sugar and basin, and the teapot, sugar and basin, and the carrially not, or he would not have told me about it until he had secured it. He had offered to give her a large sum for it, but nothing would induce her to part with it. It was, like mine, a family relic, and, as the owner was in want of meney, there did not seem to be any chance of persuading her to surrender it. Her name, he informed me, was of miss Crofton; her residence, 122 one of the carriage for you of the next day came to my house. I wook care to have a choice little re-Spring Importations!

"Come early," he said. "Then ADDITIONAL GOODS EECEIVED we shall have time to go through the cabinet's by daylight. Afterward I will give you some dinner."
Headley's house was in a quiet square, in a good, if not the most fashionable, part of London. I found my host delighted to see me, and panting to show his treasures. He was a genuine member of that species known as "the enthusiastic collector," whose passions for accumulating rarities amounts almost to mania; and I am bound to say that his collection was one to be proud of. I should time the reader, ward I will give you some dinner.'

When I was first seized with the passion for cellecting, it naturally formed the nucleus of my cabinet. Every one admired it, and envied me the possession of it. One day—it was after I had formed a decent collection, and was getting well known as a buyer—Wharton, the dealer, called upon me to show me a few things he had picked up in the country. Letrew his attention to my Chelses. He examined it closely.
