Lady Wyvernes' Daughter.

"Leave Spain!" she said, slowly, as though the idea was difficult of realization. "Leave, never to return?"

The color faded from the beautiful young face, the dark, loving eyes grew dim with tears. She could not bear to return to that dreadfully lonely life; she could not bear to be left alone; it was so sweet to be loved and cared for.

He watched her intently as these thoughts rushed through her mind; something in that exquisite downcast face gave him courage.

"It is bitter grief to me," he continued; "for, Inez, you must know how much I have loved you. From the first moment I saw your face, you have been the star of my life. Leaving you is bitter as death, for I cannot live without you."

"Are you obliged to go?" she asked, gently, as he for the first time clasped her hands in his own.

"Obliged? Yes," he replied; "urgent affairs call me there. Need I say that I will let them all go—nay, I would give my very life itself for one word from you, my beloved. One word from those lips would more than repay me for all. Tell me, shall I go or stay?"

He drew her to him, and kissed the beautiful, girlish face that drooped upon his shoulder.

"Tell me," he whispered. "Decide for me. Shall I go or stay?"

The breath of the summer wind was not more sweet than the voice that murmured "Stay."

Then he told her how dearly he loved her. Surely never did human lips tell a more passionate or beautiful story than those of Count Rinaldo, how her face had haunted him in

CORNS

Lift Off with Fingers

Don't hurt a bit! Drop a little "Freesome" on an aching corn, instantly that corn stops hurting, then shortly you lift it right off with your fingers. Truly! over that child," said Madame Monteleone to herself. "She grows more lovely every day. I never saw anything like those eyes; something must be done. She cannot remain buried here. I will wait two months longer, and then, if I am no better, I will write to Lord Lyane."

These two months spelled the life of Inez Lyane. On the morrow Count Rinaldo came. He had so much to say. First of all there was a pathetic history to be given of his family, the Montalis of Venice—how in a political crisis that had happened only twenty years before, when he was a child in his mother's arms, they had lost the whole of their property. It was confiscated, and given to one of their most bitter opponents. The blow had killed his father, and his mother had lived until he was twelve years old. Her small income then became his own, and on that he had subsisted, living always in the hope that at some future day his lost possessions would be restored to him. So far, all was true; but here Count Rinaldo diverged from the broad line of truth into a narrow line of fiction.

His friends, he said, were anxious to bring about a marriage between him and the only child and heiress of the man who held his estates, the young and beautiful Veronica di Giotto. Here again the truth was interwoven with fiction. Veronica di Giotto really existed; but her father would sooner have seen her dead than married to the son of one whom he considered as a traitor and a rebel. Such a marriage, the count said, would ultimately restore him to his proper position. No doubt of his story crossed the young girl's mind.

"And you," she said, looking at him with her shining, lovely eyes, "you give all this up for me? How much you must love me!"

He clasped her again to his heart, and told her he loved her better than life itself. Still, had she looked at him, she would have seen doubt and hesitation in his eyes. Indecision in the quivering of his hot, dry lips. He hardly dared to broach the subject he had intended to decide this evening.

"Better do it," he thought, "while the tale I have told is fresh and vivid—it is my only chance."

"So you will understand, my beloved," he said, "why I beg your silence for the present. I should be both proud and happy to proclaim to all the world that I had won the great treasure of your love. But if it were known just now it would ruin my cause forever. Those friends who have espoused it would cease to feel any interest in the matter. In another year or two it will not signify."

Writing in the Sky.

Facts About the Latest Aerial Marvel.

If you are one of the thirty million people in this country who have seen sky-writing by aeroplanes, you must have wondered how this wonderful invention works.

It was Major Savage, a British air pilot, who nearly a year ago made the wonderful discovery which he has since patented all over the world. One bright summer day he startled London by appearing in an aeroplane thousands of feet up and proceeding to write words of an advertisement in white smoke.

Sky-writing is not an easy task. It must be done at almost lightning speed, and under considerable difficulties. In the first place, the pilot must choose the position from which he will start with reference to the direction and speed of the wind, the position of the sun, the area his writing will cover, and the corresponding location of the spectators.

The Pilot's Memory-Picture.

His own memory-picture is of the words as they would appear in a mirror—that is, reversed—for he must write in this topsy-turvy way for those who are looking up from below to read it the right way round. He must also have worked out accurately how he is to approach each letter in turn. There is no time, when once started, to study instruments and plans or sketches.

Proportion and alignment are the next two points the sky-writer must study. The letters must not merely be the right shape and equally spaced, but must be kept the same size and not grow or dwindle like a family of ducks waddling across a field.

The letters as written in the sky are usually about half a mile in length. A moderate-sized advertisement in the sky would stretch a distance equal to that from Dover to Calais. On some occasions, according to a writer in the "Strand Magazine" for May, sky-writing has remained legible for more than an hour.

Fashions and Fads.

Numerous layers of chiffon and lace make charming summer evening gowns.

A slip of gold cloth is charming worn under a frock of yellow organdy.

Small felt hats in white and jade are trimmed with huge coils of ribbon.

An attractive brocaded satin is used for one of the smart novelty jackets.
