Fate of Sir Hugh.

This youth seemed to have passed away; his smooth forehead was already furrowed like that of a middle-aged man, and its hair hair had worn off it slightly, making him look ten years older; and yet there was that in Hugh Redmond's face, if Margaret could have seen it, that would have falled her pure heart with exceeding than. For though the pallor caused by suffering was still there, and those who saw him a result of the pallor caused by suffering was still there, and those who saw him a result of the part would say; and was blaming herself or her discontent; and then she sung very softly a verse of her favorite hymn:

"He that thou blessest is our good, And unblest good is ill. him look ten years older; and yet there was that in Hugh Redmond's face, if Mar-garet could have seen it, that would have filled her pure heart with exceeding thank-filled her pure heart with exceeding thankfulness.

For though the pallor caused by suffering was still there, and those who saw him said Sir Hugh was a broken man, yet there was a nobler expression than it had ever worn in happier days. The old frestul lines round the mouth were gone; and, though the eyes looked sadly round at the old familiar faces, as though missing the ruest and best, still, there was a chastened gravity about his whole mien that spoke of new and earnest purpose; of a heart so humbled at last that it field to its best refuge, and had found strength in the time of need.

And all is right that seems most wrong If it be Thy sweet will."

But almost before she had finished the last line, she was startled by her brother's abrupt entrance.

"Percy! oh, I did not hear you," she faltered, and she turned a little pale, and her heart began to beat more quickly. It was foolish of her, but she never heard Percy's step without listening involuntarily for the quick light tread that used to follow it, but that never came now.

"You are alone" he said, quickly, with a keen glance round the room. "Well, it is best because I wanted to speak to you.
Have you heard from Miss Davenport lately, Fern?"

"Yes," she stammered, raising her soft eyes to his face with a pitying expression;
"I had a letter the other day."

"Well, impatiently, "does she say when they are coming back?"

"In another fortnight—at least they mean to start then; and there she stopped, and looked at him very piteously. "How I wish mother would come; she will not be very long, and—and I would rather that you heard it from her."

"Do you mean that you have anything special to tell me?" he asked, struck by her of need.

Many years afterward he owned, to one who was ever his closest friend, that a whole life-time of suffering had been compressed into those few short years; that had followed his father's death. The whole plan and purpose of his youth had been marred; his heart wasted by a passion that was denied satisfaction; and lastly, just as heaves hearinging to turn to his prejucted. was denied satisfaction; and lastly, just as he was beginning to turn to his neglected wife with a sympathy and interest that promised well for future happiness, suddenly he found his name outraged and his home foresaken, and the load and terror of an unbearable remorse laid heavily upon him.

That was a strange winter to Hugh Redmond—the strangest and saddest he had ever passed; when he spent long, solitary days in the old Hall; and only Eric—generous, kind-hearted Eric—came now and ous, kind-nearted interest then to break his solitude. Ah! he missed her then.

Ah! he missed her then.

Sometimes, as he wandered disconsolately through the empty rooms, or sat by his lonely fireside in the twilight, the fancy would haunt him that she would come back to him yet—that the door would open, and a little figure come stealing through the darkness and run into his arms with a low, glad cry. And sometimes, when he stood in her room and saw the empty cot over which she used to hang so fondly, a longing would seize him for the boy whom he had never held in his arms.

would seize him for the boy whom he had never held in his arms.

By and by, when the spring returned, some of his old strength and vigor came back, and he was able to join personally in the search, when a new zest and excitement seemed added to his life; and in the chase he learned to forget Margaret and the shadows of a too sorrowful past.

When the sweet face of his Wee Wife seemed to lurchim on with the sad Undine syes that he remembered so well; when, with the contrariety of man ever eager for the unattainable, he began to long more and more to see her; when his anger revived, and impatience with it. And, though he hardly owned it to himself, both anger and impatience were born of love, St. Luke's little summer was over, the sipe golden days of October binds in her sheaf, the richest and rarest of the year's harvest, had been followed by chill fogsdull sullen days—during which flaring gasiights burned in Mrs. Watkins' shop even at noonday, and Fern's busy fingers, never willingly idle, worked by the light of a lamp long before the muffin boy and milkman made their afternoon rounds in the Elysian Fields. Elysian Fields.

Anything further removed from the typical idea of the Elysian Fields con-scarcely be imagined than on such an after-noon. It was difficult, even for a lighthearted person, to maintain a uniform cheerfulness where damp exuded everywhere, and the moist, thick air seemed to close round in vaporous folds. Somewhere, no doubt, the sun was shining, and might possible shine again; but it was hard to realize it—hard to maintain outward or inward geniality under such depressing circumstances. Fern had turned from the window with Fern had turned from the window with an involuntary shudder. Then she lighted her lamp, stirred the fire, and sat down to her embroidery. As her needle flew through the canvas her lips seemed to close with an expression of patient sadness. There were sorrowful curves that no one ever saw, for Fern kept all her thoughts to herself.

ever saw, for Fern kept all her thoughts to herself.

Never since the night when she had sobbed out her grief on her mother's bosom, when utterance of her girlish despair and longing had filled that mother's heart with dismay, never since then had Fern spoken of her trouble. "We will never talk of it again," she had said, when the outburst was over: "it will do no goot;" and her mother had sorrowfully acquiesced.

Mrs. Trafford knew that only time, that beneficent healer, could deaden her child's pain. Fern's gentle nature was capable of quiet but intense feeling. Nea's faithful and ardent affections were reproduced in her child. It was not only the loss of her girlish dreams over which Fern mourned.
Her women's love had unconsciously rooted itself, and could not be torn up without suffering. An unerring instinct told her that Erle had not always been indifferent to her; that once, not so very long ago, his friendship had been true and deep. Well, she had forgiven his fickleness. No bitterpess rankled in her heart ngainst him, He had been very kind to her; he would not wish her to be unhappy.

But she was very brave. She would not look at the future. The cold blankness, the narrow groove, would have chilled her heart. She only took each day as it came, and tried to do her best with it.
