The radio and television networks of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation have performed an invaluable service not only in bringing the various Canadian arts before a national audience but also in producing original films and dramas designed specifically for broadcasting.

Montreal is the fourth largest producer of television programmes in the world, and is first in the production of French-language programmes.

As does CBC, the private radio and television stations throughout Canada carry classical music and drama for that part of their audience that has no taste for a steady diet of light entertainment.

The contribution of the National Film Board to the popularizing of the arts has been only slightly smaller than that of the CBC, and its original productions have probably been more extensive.
