"I have done my best in France, and was sent back to Canada in March, this year. I am in the best of health. They are keeping men here for no reason whatever. I married my fiancee as soon as I returned to Canada. My wife has written to Major E. H. Worse Than Prison.

"Would you kindly let me know why I have not yet received my discharge? I whould think they could get it ready in four months. It did not take me four months to enlist. The treatment we get here is worse than in prison. I am locked up and the only air I can get it thru the windows. My wife is worried about me and every time I write the authorities read the letters, only one out of ten reaching my wife. The rest doubtless go into the wastepaper basket.

It was stated at headquarters that each case in such hospitals as Cobourg merited individual treatment, and all such cases were among the most difficult both to diagnose and to treat. There was a small margin of difference between the mental patient and the shell-shock patient at certain stages of both maladies, and it was impossible in some cases to do full justice to their needs.

Gunner Hartman, who enlisted some three years ago, saw service in France, returned to Canada on March 22, 1919, and who is also now resident in Cobourg Military Hospital, has written to the Veteran Column of The Toronto World, asking that the attention of the proper authorities be brought to his case.
