I was awaken to shad heard in the night, sounds shape stalking down the slope of very audible now when I gave ice to seize and devour me, and them my attention—sometimes sat up trembling with horror that a hollow, distant rumbling as of was not a little increased by my some great body dislodged and seemed to see a movement in his breast, and I took him by the shoulder; but in the hurry of my feelings I exerted more strength than I was sensible of. I pushed him with the violence of sudden trepidation; my hand slipped off his shoulder, and he fell on his side avaetly as companion to speak to !"

I had no mind to lie down again. The cold indeed was cruelly sharp, and the smoke sped from my mouth as though I held a tobacco-pipe betwixt my teeth. I got upon the ice and stepped about it quickly, darting searching glances into the gloom to left and graph of the setting moon: but right of the setting moon; but offering as solid a surface as the all lay bear, bleak and black. I bare ice, This encouraged me to all lay bear, bleak and black. I pulled off my stout gloves with the hope of getting my fingers to tingle by handling the snow; but it was frozen so hard I could not scrape up with my nails as much as a half-dozen of flakes would make. What I got I dissolved in my mouth and found it brakish; however, I suspected it would be sweeter and perhaps not so stonily frozen higher up, where there was less chance of the salt spray mingling with it. where there was less chance of the salt spray mingling with it, and I resolved when the light came to fill my empty beer-bottles as with salt or pounded sugar for use hereafter—that is, if it should prove sweet; as to melting it, I had indeed a tinder box and the means of obtaining fire, but no fuel.

I that had concealed him. His head was bowed and his knees drawn up to a level with his chin, and his nakedhands were clasped upon his legs. His attitude was that of a person lost in thought—very easy and calm.

I stopped as if I had been shot through the heart. Had it been a bear or a sea-lion, or any crea-had indeed a under box and the means and the means and the means and the of obtaining fire, but no fuel.

It seemed as if the night had been short for only just descended, so tardy was attend dawn. Outside the slanting wall of ise that made my haven the swell swept past in gurgling, bubbling drowning sound, dismal and ghastly, as though in truth some such ogre as the monster I had been a ship, and watched the stars dying and the frozen shore darkening to the dim and sifting dawn behind it, against which the outline of the cliffs ran in a broken streak of ink. The rising of the sun gave me fresh life. The ice flashed out of its slatish hue into a radiant white, the ocean changed into a rich blue that seemed as viole, under the paler azure of the heavens; but I could now see that the swell was heavier than I had suspected from the echo of its remote roaring in the port. It even the swell was heavier than I had suspected from the echo of its remote roaring in the port. It even the swell was heavier than I had suspected from the echo of its remote roaring in the port. It ran steadily out of the north-east. This was miserable to see; for the line of its running was directly my course, and if I committed myself to it in that little boat the impulse of the long and swinging folds could not but set me steadily southward, unless a breeze sprang up in that quarter to blow me towards the sun. There was a small current of air stirring—a mere trickle of the long and swinging folds could not but set me steadily southward, unless a breeze sprang up in that quarter to blow me towards the sun. might view the ice and the ocean round about and form a judgement of the weather by the aspect of the sky, of which only the western part was visible from my low strand. But first I must break my fast. I remember bitterly lamenting the lack of means to make a fire, that I might obtain a warm meal and a hot drink and dry my gloves, coat and breeches, to which the damp of the salt clung tenaciously. Had this ice been land, though the most desolate, gleomy, repulsive spot in the world, I had surely found something that would burn.

I sat in the boat to eat, and while thus occupied pondered in the world, I had surely found something that would burn.

I sat in the boat to eat, and while thus occupied pondered in turn his head and start to behold me. My emotions were too tumultous to analyze, yet I believe I was more frightened than gladdened by the sight of a fellow-creature, though not long before I had sighed bitterly for some one to speak to. I looked around again, prepared to find another one like him taking stock of me from behind a rock, and then ventured to approach him by a few steps the better to see him turn his head and start to behold me. My emotions were too tumultous to analyze,

Now leisurely and curiously observing it, it seemed to me that his costume. the north part of it, from much about the spot where my boat lay, was formed of a chain of icebergs knitted one to another in a conknitted one to another i solidated range of irregular low steeps. The beautiful appearance of spires, towers, and the like persuaded me he was in one of seemed as if they had been formed by an upheaval as of an earth-upon a man in frozen places; for quake, of splinters and bodies as of the frozen stuff; for, so far as it was possible for me to see from it was possible for me to see from the low shore, wherever these radiant and lovely figures were I went close to him and peered assembled I noticed great rents spacious caverns, narrow and His eyes were fixed; they re-canvas that covered me to be the groping of the ogre's hand over my face.

I pushed the sail away and stood up, but had instantly to sit again, my legs being terribly cramped. A drink of spirits helped me; my blood presently flowed with briskness.

The moon was in the west; she hung large, red and distorted, and shed no light save her reflection, that waved in the sea under her like several lengths of undulating red-hot wire. My haven was still very tranqui—the boat lay calm; but there was a deeper tone in the booning sound of the distant surf, and a more menacing note in the echoing of the work of dissolution was perpetually progressing, and that this prodigious island, which appeared to barricale the horizon, might in a few months be dwindled into half a score of rapidly dissolving bergs.
