History records that this prince was tried, condemned, and ignominiously executed.

It is a singular circumstance, that the reason given for the execution of this prince was that of having defended his native land from the usurpation of a tyrant.

In the meantime the boy Thelyon, who had shown some indications of returning life, was carried, by the humane directions of Mortimer, to his own tent.

The young commander himself frequently watched the sick bed side, and ministered to the various wants of his charge.

Some time elapsed before the youth exhibited any symptoms of recovery.

The strength of his mind aggravated the pain of his wound, and mortally retarded his convalescence.

Mortimer tried by every art to soothe and divert his grief, sometimes cheering him with the hopes of renewed health, and sometimes by the tedious hours of his suffering with anecdotes of his own adventures.

At first he recovered all the attention that was bestowed upon him with silence and seeming indifference.

After the poignancy of his sorrows, however, he was blunted by time, the boy acknowledged the kindness, and a grateful look, a slight pressure of the hand, and a few low words that might be traced already the lines of suffering and sorrow.

Thelyon had the appearance of being about sixteen years of age. He was tall and graceful. His form, though slight and delicate, was beautifully symmetrical.

There was a certain air of nobility in his countenance, and a certain softness in his general behaviour, as if he bore his fate with placid resignation; but his occasional frowns that gleamed from his expressive eye betokened the inward workings of an undisciplined spirit.

His fair hair clustered in profuse curls over and open and intelligent brow, on which might be traced already the lines of suffering and sorrow.

Mortimer approached and spoke to the impression of the morning words of kindness. "Come, my brave boy," said he, "I shall have nothing to fear: I will be your friend, you shall be to me as a brother."

The youth took his hand and pressed it to his lips, and, keeping his eyes on the landscape, he said, "I pray heaven bless and reward you, noble and generous foe: love you much more than I can express."

Thelyon turned to the knight and said, "I am weak and poor, for my heart is sick, my soul is oppressed, the remembrance of the past is agonizing."

Time rolled on; weeks and months passed away. Orderly to be established and government maintained in the conquered provinces. At first the youth pressed hard upon the vanquished; they felt the weight of his hand, and the force of his arm.

But as time passed, the youth's feelings softened, and he began to show signs of leniency towards the vanquished.
