When the Horton law was repealed by athletic clubs decided to reap a harvest during the remaining months in which prize fighting was legal. Matches between the leading fighters of the world in the several classes were arranged, and for a time it looked as though the sport would wind up in a blaze of glory. But alas for the visions of big box office receipts! The fighters took the situation in their own hands and as a result several of the most interesting matches have been declared off.

He realizes that a pugilist in that particular business must have a reputation of considerable magnitude as a fighter in order to draw trade. It has taken McCoy years to build up the reputation he now enjoys as one of the cleverest fighters in the ring, and, not wishing to lose that the reputation and being fearful of the result of a meeting with Sharkey under disadvantageous conditions, he announces that he will probably never fight again.
