RUSE OF A MINOR POET.

layed a Trick on Kipling and the Times. Somebody as worked a hoar on the about this.

Somebody as worked a hoax on the London Times. Some verses entitled "The Old Volunteer" were sent in by mail from Brighton over the well-known signature of Rudyard Kipling, and the editor of the Times accepted and published them. But Mr. Kipling sent in a letter repudiating the verses—he had not written them, knew nothing about them, and his signature had been forged.

No doubt some of our readers will declare that they would have known at once that the lines were not by Kipling, but would they have known?

when You drop down dead"; But there'll be a better Judgment for The Last Relay; I shall hear the bugle calling, the series of kipling's name to these verses probably does not feel the least bit penitent. He got his verses in the London Times; he will feel that they are as good as if they had been Kipling's. The incident will delight amateur poets, who will say that it shows that editors are influenced more by the name of the author than the merit of the poem. But they should not forget that there is a news value in verse by Kipling. Even a poor poem by so famous a writer will excite more public interest than a good one from an up-known person. Perhaps we could go further than that, and say that a poor poem by Kipling would excite more interest than even a good one The forger of Kipling's name to poor poem by Kipling would encite more interest than even a good one by him—it would arouse so much discussion and speculation as to a possible decline in his powers.
